Last year, Limardo scored five goals in the victory over California–San Diego at the NCAA Championships. Gonzalez will look to break several records this weekend, including personal goals, which he set last season at 78.

The Minutemen will also see the return of Bob Coletti from sick leave and goalie Alex Mujica, who stands first all– time in save percentage, second in total saves, and third in goals against average. Goalie Paul Engin will also be a standout for defense.

The team has been working on their conditioning level this past week in practice.

"I'm more concerned about us adapting to the physical level of play and the counter–attack fast–break," Yarworth said. "It's a lot different when you go out there. It's a different style of refereeing and quality of counter–attack."

Yarworth also has the team working on its power play, man–up and man–down percentages. "I would like to see a 60 percent conversion rate on offense, and hope the other team has 30 percent."

The Minutemen will play the Redlands and Santa Clara on Saturday. Yarworth anticipates that his team will meet No. 12 San Diego and seventh–ranked Santa Barbara on Sunday, but only Saturday's results will tell.

The University of Massachusetts women's rugby team will travel to Amherst College tomorrow morning at 11 a.m., continuing a local–team rivalry.

the forwards are untested. Sophomore left wing Nell Donovan, one of many Catholic Memorial High School products in the league, had a good freshman year [7–10–17] and may be on the verge of a breakthrough season.

Lowell is fortunate that it boasts an experienced bunch of blueliners, who will have to help Lindsay ease into his pressurized role. Senior Captain Aaron Kriss is big [6–foot–2 inches, 204 pounds] and reliable, with 88 Division I games to his credit. Drafted by the San Jose Sharks in 1991 [11th round, 221st overall], Kriss is a quiet leader who continues to improve. Sophomore Ed Campbell can also wrap up a few forwards with his imposing frame [6–foot–2, 198 pounds] and could be a key to the Riverhawks' power play.

UMass–Amherst is obviously the youngest team in the conference, but their state school brethren to the east and north are not far behind. Kriss, defenseman Paul Botto and center Eric Brown are the only seniors on the roster.

Crowder has done a good job recruiting former local high school standouts. In addition to Donovan, Crowder also landed forward Jarrod Dibona, a redshirt freshman who dazzled during his prep career at Archbishop Williams, and defensman Jason Cormier, one of the highest–scoring players at his position in the public school division during his days at Waltham High School.

UMass Coach Joe Mallen may have actually outdone Crowder, and that competition for signees ought to naturally extend onto the ice, which Crowder hopes it will.

"I think it's great. I think it's going to be good for both schools," Crowder said. "It's going to be an opportunity for a little bit of rivalry for bragging rights, and hopefully we'll get the [Massachusetts] governor [William Weld] to because I feel that it is a crime for us to not perform up to our abilities.

"I really don't want to see this team underachieve. [The pre–game talk at W&M] just came out."

As to why Albert's play is somewhat overshadowed, it may have to do with that fact that his game is a simple one. The soft–spoken Albert plays and excels, and lets his game do the talking.

"He's not maybe as flashy as Corky [Corcoran], but, boy, you look at the numbers, and they're not all that far apart," said Hodges.

For Hodges, his coaching staff and the players, having a guy like Albert around is special. Players with Albert's work ethic, intensity and dedication to all aspects of life are hard to find.

"You know, it's going to be funny not having him around next year. He's as good as it gets."

"The coaches always say that if you work hard, you get what you deserve," said Albert. "I think I'm a testament of those beliefs."

Albert and the Minutemen [4–2, 3–1 in Yankee Conference] head down to Delaware to take on the Fightin' Blue Hens [3–3, 2–3 in YanCon] tomorrow afternoon at Delaware Stadium [1 p.m.]

The Fightin' Blue Hens are coming off a 28–3 win over at Richmond, accumulating 414 total yards, with 307 coming on the ground.

Delaware was knocked off the Top 25 poll for the first time in 42 weeks of play, dating back to the 1991 pre–season poll. The Minutemen–Hens game is Homecoming, just as the game was last year at Massachusetts.

six teams nationally that UMass has a losing record against as the Huskies lead the all time series 13–10–2.

"In the UMass tradition, UConn is the game," said Donnelly. "It's always been the end of the year. It's always an outstanding game. This is the first year in a few years that it's really going to live up to what it used to be."

UConn enters the game in somewhat of a slump. After starting the season strongly, it has slipped to No. 8 in the polls after several losses including an upset at the hands of New Hampshire.

"They need this game," Donnelly said. "They just got upset by UNH, so they absolutely must have this game. They're going to come out flying. I think it's going to be a classic UMass–UConn game."

The Minutewomen enter the game at No. 4 in the NCAA poll, their highest ranking this season after upsetting No. 1 North Carolina and No. 2 James Madison on consecutive weekends. When the NCAA tournament rolls around, the top four seeds earn first round byes and home field advantage in the second round. Winning the remainder of their games is crucial for the Minutewomen if they want to retain the bye.

"I feel confident about where we are," said Donnelly. "But it's going to be a battle for seeding. Because of what we've done and where we are now, this Sunday's game is the biggest game of the year."

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19) The grim irony of loved ones can make the difference in the world. You no longer feel alone! Get outdoors. Communing with the elements boosts your spirits. Let Mother Nature mend her wonderful spirit.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) Your words have a spellbinding effect when you give free rein to your imagination. Self-expression is an art. Balance hard work with no restraint for a good enthusiasm re-charger.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) Overcome worry or reluctance and go straight to your goal. Your chances of obtaining what you want are excellent! You have tremendous healing power in your hands. Offer an ailing loved one a massage.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) You still seem feel ready to take direct action. Meanwhile, make sure a plan is flawless. Postpone intellectual pursuits that keep you isolated from your loved ones. Family fun deserves top priority.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) A restless mood could find you exploring a new neighborhood or phoning friends at a distance. Make plans for next weekend. Home may be the best place for you tonight. Read a good book.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) Brilliant health is the best contributor to excellent workmanship. If you have any doubts about a course of treatment, discuss it with qualified experts.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) Keep cash and valuables out of sight. A so-called "coincidence" may be nothing of the sort. An important matter comes up this afternoon. Call a family conference at the end of the day if someone is involved.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) A use-of-words game can be a golden opportunity to make valuable contacts. An attractive member of the opposite sex may be leading you into new areas of pleasure and dignity. Try a new approach to romance.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) Differences of opinion could lead to new battles. A fresh approach is needed on both sides. Creative and intellectual endeavors prove especially rewarding.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) Family should come first today. Take time out to tend to your offspring's needs. A candid conversation can help you overcome some other's fears or opposition. Take the initiative. Lower barriers can see new good friends.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) Join friends and fellow club members at a brief event. Interesting discussions contribute to your store of information. Hosting a lively party is not as difficult as some people think. Invite easygoing guests.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) A serious person right on target. Converse over energy by no longer rushing into every project that promises profit. A family gets more resolutely a bungalow problem. Travel for business or pleasure this coming week.

Still–improving Albert truly a coach's dream

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

"[Ben's] everything that any coach looks for in a student– athlete. He does everything right no matter what you ask him do, whether it's weightlifting or going to class, practicing hard or playing hard. He does it all."
– Minuteman Coach Mike Hodges

Ben Albert is a coach's dream.

The University of Massachusetts senior defensive tackle arrived four years ago, and the progress Albert has made has been outstanding. The reason behind it is simple.

Hard work.

The work has paid off as Albert continues to improve from practice to practice, game to game. The co–captain along with running back Rene Ingoglia is enjoying the best season of his career, capped off by last week's 12–tackle, one–sack effort in the Minutemen's upset of William & Mary, 23–14.

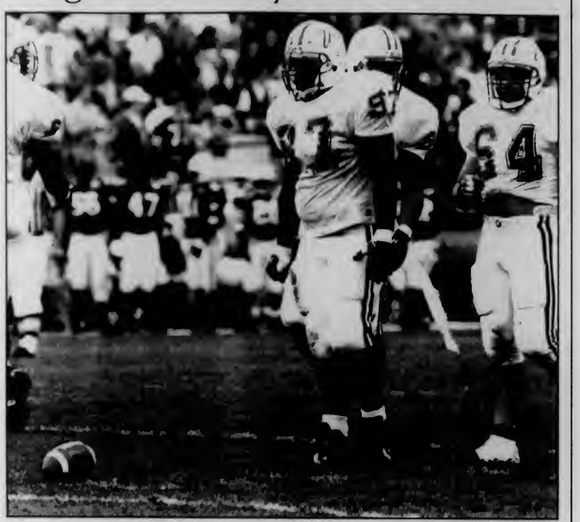
Albert has totaled 43 tackles thus far, and is tied for the team lead in quarterback sacks [with senior defensive end Brian Corcoran] with seven for losses totaling a team–high 51 yards.

The four years of improvement started in his freshman year of 1991 when he played in nine games, and recorded seven tackles. The next season, Albert became a starter, and recorded 54 tackles as well as three fumble recoveries.

Next came two knee operations prior to his junior year, forcing Albert to miss spring ball. Less time to prepare for the 1993 season initially left the Paterson, N.J., native a bit behind. No matter.

Albert picked up right where he left off, starting all eleven games. He totaled 56 tackles on the year, 33 unassisted, and recorded five sacks for minus–31 yards, fourth on the Minuteman squad.

Now, it's Albert's last season of his collegiate career, and has yet to let up.



COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior defensive tackle Ben Albert [97] of the University of Massachusetts football team has steadily improved over the course of four seasons, and is enjoying arguably his best season thus far.

"As a player, Ben's just a guy who keeps getting better," said Hodges. "He understands what's going on, he understands what people are trying to do to him. His production this year has really shot up. He's really playing good football.

"He's been a three–year starter for us, but he's gone beyond starter–status. To me, he's having an All–Conference– type year."

Albert is the leader of a strong and deep defensive unit. As for his capabilities as a captain, he chooses to lead by example. The example is of hard work and intensity, and it has paid off as the defensive front sports some seven–plus ready to play. Albert's work ethic undoubtedly rubs off on the rest of the team.

As for his leadership qualities, Hodges notes that while Albert does normally lead by example rather than being the vocal leader, he saw a different Albert step up in the minutes leading up to the William & Mary game.

"I'll tell you what, before the [William & Mary], he led by more than example," said Hodges. "He was really excited and ready to play, and helped our team get ready with some things he said before the game.

"As a matter–of–fact, when he got done, I said 'let's go.' That's all I said, and [the team] was ready to play."

"I've noticed that in the past years I've been here that later on in the season, football has sort of worn on the guys, and they have slowed down. I really don't want that to happen to this team, not only because it's my last season, but

Key tilt for Minutewomen

Game crucial in tight NE regional

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

There is a noticeable trend in looking at the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team results to date.

The squad opened the 1994 ripping off seven straight wins, before dropping two straight decisions in Santa Barbara, Calif. But after the two losses, the team reeled off two more wins. A loss, a win and another loss followed that.

So if this streaky pattern follows suit tomorrow at Connecticut [3 p.m.], the 10–4 Minutewomen should come away with a triumph. But Coach Jim Rudy wants no talk of trends. He simply wants to have two solid practices before the match, and have his squad find the early season form which made it so successful.

"I'm really not going to do any real scouting with UConn. It's more of getting ourselves prepared, and getting the rhythm back and the composure."
–UMass Coach Jim Rudy

"Apparently, the players had a very nice team meeting [Wednesday] that was positively received by people I talked to," said Rudy. "Some of the things I'm aware of that were addressed were team play versus individuality. I don't think the issue here was ever a "me versus I" related thing.

"It's hard to tell now. We'll know when we play UConn. I feel like everyone has been trying so hard, that they're not letting game come to them."

UConn, on the other hand, has been playing some excellent soccer as of late. A main reason for the success is 13–year Coach Len Tsantiris' philosophy of rotating fresh players into the flow of the action.

Because of this, UMass' preparation for the match has focused less on the Huskies on–field tactics, and more on its own game plan.

"They play so many players almost every game, it's hard to prepare for them," said Rudy. "I'm really not going to do any real scouting with UConn. It's more of getting ourselves prepared, and getting the rhythm back and the composure."

In UMass' 1–0 loss to Dartmouth, Rudy uncharacteristically used a substitution pattern that had almost every player seeing playing time. Yet, with the new–look starting line–up and subbing pattern, the squad was still unable to muster a consistent offensive attack. Rudy remains optimistic this will change come Saturday.

UConn is certainly a formidable opponent, and the match undoubtedly has significant impact in the Northeast regional race.

"Right now, UConn is in the driver's seat," he said. "They haven't lost in the region. Apparently, they are playing very well together right now, and have run off a fairly impressive streak. Their strength is they spread everything around. Six or seven different people have scored game–winning goals."

Earlier this season, the Huskies won some key matches — a 1–0 upset of highly–touted Portland and a 1–0 triumph over Hartford being the most notable two. And with tough matches against UMass and Cornell still ahead, UConn has no means to play overconfident, as the homestretch provides some top–notch competition.

With Ginny Woodward, Karen Warner and Kerry Connors leading the way, the Huskies have a fine nucleus to work around. "It will be a worthy test as we try to make our way back," said Rudy.

UM–BU contest called due to rain, plan to reschedule

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Lightning really does strike twice.

Almost exactly a year ago, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team traveled to Boston University, only to have the game called with 26:54 remaining in the game when lightning illuminated the Boston skyline.

When the game was resumed two weeks later, the game was completed as the rain fell again. The Terriers came away with a 2–1 upset win.

Yesterday afternoon the "rivalry in the rain" continued as Mother Nature forced the game to suffer the same fate as last year's.

Citing dangerous field conditions, the referees halted the game with 18:20 seconds remaining.

"It was just getting too slick out there," UMass Coach Megan Donnelly said. "We were concerned about injuries."

"They brought [the rain] last year," said BU goalie Kerry Windgardner. "We just had to return the favor."

Donnelly and BU Coach Sally Starr will discuss today as a time where the game can be completed.

"I hope it continues like last year," Donnelly said. "The home team won there so we hope it continues this year.

"The advantage is definitely for the home team."

The No. 4 Minutewomen [10–1–3] will make their final regular season road trip this weekend when they resume their rivalry with No. 8 UConn [12–3–1].

Since the series began, it seems like every UMass and UConn match up has been significant. Coach Nancy Stevens is among the all–time leaders in wins with 234. In the first– ever NCAA Championship game in 1981, the Huskies defeated the Minutewomen, 4–1.

Last year, Pam Hixon's 250th victory came against the Huskies. UConn is one of only

BU heads Hockey East

By Anthony Guido and Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Hockey East is regarded as the premier conference in collegiate hockey. Created in 1984, Hockey East quickly rose to prominence on the national scene.

This year the conference has expanded to nine teams, with the addition of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Last season the conference sent four teams to the NCAA tournament. Here's a look at how this years teams stack up, in the Collegian's predicted order of finish:

Boston University [34–7, 21–3 in Hockey East]

Whoa. The Terriers are the No. 1 team in the nation, and they boast what Coach Jack Parker calls "the best defensive unit we've ever had." With that in front of All–Hockey East goalie Derek Herlofsky, and a deep crew of multi–faceted forwards in front of the defense, Parker's side should take the final step to a national title that it failed to make in the 1991 and 1994 championship games.

Defensemen Kaj Linna and Rich Brennan and forward Jacques Joubert were also named to HE's All–Conference squad. J.P. McKersie is out for the season, and freshman Tom Noble [Catholic Memorial HS] is ready to step in. The defense is further aided by first round draft pick Jeff Kealty [22nd overall, Quebec], another CM grad.

Northeastern University [20–12–7, 10–8–6]

Coach Ben Smith has built a fine program, reaching the NCAA tournament last season. Sniper J.F. Aube [28 goals, 15 assists, 43 points] is a pre–season first–team conference selection. Jordon Shields [15–29–44] teams with Aube to form an explosive combination.

Todd Reynolds gives NU a stopper in goal, with the strength of the club the depth on defense. Francois Bouchard [15–15–30] is one of the top offensive defensemen in the league and Darryl MacNair, Dan McGillis and Jason Kelly provide toughness. The sky is the limit for the Huskies, who can go a long way if Reynolds can stay healthy.

University of New Hampshire [25–12–3, 13–9–2]

The Wildcats return a senior group led by top scorer Eric Flinton [16–25–41]. Forward Nick Poole [10–28–38] also returns as does goal–leader Eric Boguniecki [17–16–33].

The Wildcats are still waiting for the replacement of Snively Arena, so they won't have that great home ice advantage. A quality tandem in goal with Trent Cavicchi and Mike Heinke will keep UNH at the top of the conference.

University of Maine [6–29–1, 3–20–1]

After a national championship in 1993, two ineligibility scandals cost the Black Bears 11 victories last year. Maine again has the talent to return to top half of the conference.

"With the exception of UMass [Amherst], we are the most inexperienced team in the league," Coach Shawn Walsh said. "We're going to be unpredictable because of that."

Walsh has to silence critics and right the ship in Orono. A return to the dominant ways of the past are at least a year away, the goal–scoring of the past is missing.

University of Massachusetts at Lowell [25–10–5, 14–6–4]

Bruce Crowder [remember him, Bruins fans?] and Co. cleaned up at last year's Hockey East postseason awards, garnering Player, Rookie, and Coach of the Year. The player, goalie Dwayne Roloson, is gone, and how well his replacement is will determine the Riverhawks' success. Greg Bullock took the league by storm, pacing all scorers.

Crowder has a firm, defensive strategy in place, but it's up to his personnel to put it to work. Lowell won't surpass the league's top dogs, but no one's going to want to face them in the conference tournament.

Boston College [15–16–5, 7–12–5]

Another school surrounded by turmoil and controversy. After being hired as coach, Mike Milbury walked away in a scholarship dispute with Athletic Director Chet Gladchuk. Jerry York steps in as coach, inheriting a young team.

Greg Taylor was outstanding in goal in BC's stunning run to the Beanpot tournament championship. Ryan Haggerty [17–23–40] leads the offense that will be key with a young defense. The Eagles should be an exciting offensive team that can achieve high standards if Taylor continues his improvement in goal.

Providence College [14–19–3, 9–12–3]

Paul Pooley inherits an experienced squad that includes 23 lettermen. Of the two most notable, one has overachieved and the other has underachieved. Chad Quenneville of South Hadley earned first team All–Hockey East honors after a great junior year [22–18–40] and will direct the offense. That should be Joe Hulbig's job, but the first round pick [13th overall, Edmonton, 1992] is only third on the left wing depth chart.

Maybe their selection of Hulbig was just another of the Oilers' many recent boneheaded moves, but Pooley concedes he "hasn't done what he's capable of." If he starts to, the Friars may "compete in the [league's] top bracket," as Umile suspects they will.

University of Massachusetts at Amherst [20–9, first season in Hockey East]

The inaugural season should be roller coaster ride for the Minutemen. Coach Joe Mallen has had two years of excellent recruiting. The very deep and talented defense will be the key, led by Jaynen Rissling [7–15–22 in 19 games]. Picked last in the pre–season coaches' poll, the Minutemen will be able to sneak up and surprise a few teams.

Scoring goals could be a problem with a lot of the burden falling on Rob Bonneau [26–21–47] and Warren Norris [20– 27–47] as well as transfer Sal Manganaro.

"We want to work to the point where we are much better in February than October," Mallen said.

The talent is there for the Minutemen to make some real noise in the conference by the end of the season.

Merrimack College [16–19–2, 8–14–2]

They say nice guys finish last, and the proverb holds true for Coach Ron Anderson. Anderson played for the worst– ever NHL entry, the 1974–75 Washington Capitals [8–67–5], but he won't be coaching a team so relatively poor. Martin Legault posted great goaltending numbers for a last place team [3.77 GAA, .892 save percentage], but the Warriors lost their two top scorers to graduation.

The defense, however, is pretty much unchanged, with potent Dan Hodge [9–22–31] at the helm. But the power play converted just 16.8 percent of its chances, not nearly enough for a squad that will mostly be outclassed at regular strength, even by the Minutemen.

Battle of UMass hits ice with Lowell vs. Amherst

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow should long be remembered as one of the most significant dates in sports history at the University of Massachusetts. It is the day the men's hockey team begins play in a more competitive conference than any other team on the campus.

"I don't think there's any question [Hockey East] is the top league," New Hampshire Coach Dick Umile confirmed.

At 7 p.m. tomorrow, Massachusetts Gov. William Weld will drop the ceremonial first puck, and the Minutemen will skate onto the ice of the University of Massachusetts– Lowell's Tully Forum for its first ever Hockey East game. It will be Lowell's first game played under its new nickname, the Riverhawks [Lowell's former nickname was the Chiefs, deemed anti–Native American by Lowell administrators.]

More importantly, it is their first game with a new number one goaltender, now that All–American Hobey Baker Award finalist Dwayne Roloson has been lost to graduation. When asked how his net situation is shaping up, Riverhawks Coach and ex–Boston Bruin Bruce Crowder replied, "It isn't. No one's stepped forward."

That's Lowell's unquestionable main concern, and it will be mostly up to Craig Lindsay to address it. Lindsay was used sparingly last year, making just eight inauspicious appearances, recording a sub–par 4.82 goals against average and an .840 save percentage. Freshmen Martin Fillion and Scott Fankhouser will also be asked to help provide answers.

Beyond the cage, Lowell is a team that proves as much as any what a formidable league this is. Only considered a middle–of–the–pack contender [fifth in the pre–season coaches' poll], the Riverhawks are coming off a spectacular campaign. Crowder earned Hockey East Coach of the Year honors as UMass–Lowell finished second to Boston University and advanced to the NCAA quarterfinals, where it fell to Minnesota, 2–1, in the second longest game (89:29) in NCAA tournament history.

Though seven players departed including Roloson and fellow All–American Shane Henry, Lowell returns league scoring champ and Rookie of the Year Greg Bullock, who compiled 24–35–59 totals in 1993–94.

Rabin to seek revenge for Muslim attack

By Ruth Sinai
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel is approaching peace with an olive branch in one hand and a gun in the other.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin gave security forces the green light to hunt down and kill military leaders of the Muslim movement waging a war of terror against Israelis, officials said Sunday. But the policy, a response to public anger at the bombing of a Tel Aviv bus, is matched by official approval of a peace treaty with Jordan and renewal of talks with Palestinians on self-rule. Even Rabin's main opposition, the conservative Likud faction, said Sunday it would support the Jordan-Israel pact. The Israeli parliament is expected to ratify the treaty Tuesday, and President Clinton will join Israeli and Jordanian officials Wednesday for the official signing.

Meanwhile, security officials reported to the Cabinet on Sunday that they had rounded up dozens of activists from the fundamentalist Muslim group Hamas since last Wednesday's bus attack. Hamas took responsibility for the bombing, which claimed its 22nd victim on Sunday when a 61-year-old woman died of her wounds.

Fearing reprisals for the bombing, about 30 Hamas activists in the Palestinian-ruled Gaza Strip and the Israeli-occupied West Bank are spending nights in hiding, a Palestinian source said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Cabinet ministers spoke of new steps against Hamas, although they would not confirm Rabin's decision to order the killing of Hamas military leaders, which received banner newspaper headlines. Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet said security forces had identified "dozens" of activists involved in the kidnap-murder of an Israeli soldier by Hamas last week. "We will find them and no one will go unpunished," he told reporters.

Police sources told The Associated Press on Sunday that the solider, Sgt. Nachshon Waxman, a dual American-Israeli citizen, was severely beaten by his captors, apparently when first abducted, but not otherwise tortured before his death.

Housing Minister Benyamin Ben-Eliezer said Israel was in "a long war" and had decided on "special treatment in dealing with the Hamas that in the end will stop them."

The military has long had a list of most-wanted activists it is authorized to kill on sight, including 27 Hamas operatives, but Rabin's new authorization covers more senior military leaders, a security official said.

The security services have "carte blanche" to pursue wanted people, said the official. But, he added, many officials draw the line at assassinating political leaders of Hamas who are not directly involved in violence.

Mahmoud Zahar, a Gaza physician and a senior Hamas political leader, criticized Rabin's decision: "Is this going to solve the problem? Of course not. But it's going to increase the recent crisis and the area is going to enter a cycle of bloodshed and no one has immunity against that."

Graffiti signed by Islamic militants was scribbled throughout Gaza City on Sunday promising more bombings, and Israeli troops shot dead an Arab after he stabbed a soldier in the West Bank town of Hebron.

The army said the man was a Hamas member released from prison six weeks ago after signing a statement disavowing violence. Palestinian residents of the city, however, said Nidal Tamimi belonged to PLO leader Yasser Arafat's mainstream Fatah faction. Hebron's Fatah faction angrily condemned the death and distributed a leaflet warning it would step up confrontations with Israeli soldiers in the city.

Panel disects media's handling of Simpson case

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Black and White Americans have different views on O.J. Simpson's guilt, reflecting underlying stereotypes on race which are reinforced by the media, according to Ann Ferguson, a professor of Afro-American studies at Smith College.

Ferguson was one of four panelists who spoke at a symposium at Hampshire College last week which discussed "The O.J. Simpson Case: A Deconstruction of Legal and Media Issues." About 50 people attended the event.

The difference of perception lies in the statistics — 67 percent of Black Americans think Simpson is innocent and the same percent of White Americans believe he is guilty, according to Sut Jhally, a University of Massachusetts communications professor.

"Being both a woman, and a Black person, I've been confused," said Ferguson. "I haven't wanted O.J. to be guilty. I don't want to see the spotlight be put on another heroic Black man."

The outcome of a fallen Black hero will be caught by all Black Americans because Ferguson said Blacks get limited positive exposure in the media.

"We've seen Mike Tyson as a wife-beater, Clarence Thomas as a sexual harasser and Michael Jackson as a child molester," Ferguson said.

All of these are problems that happen throughout society, but are dealt with through the exposure of rich, Black males, she said.

The media creates heroes and villains, according to Bill Strickland, a professor of Afro-American studies at the University of Massachusetts.

Simpson is a hero all young people can identify with because White America has made him colorless, according to Strickland. This status allows him luxury, Strickland said.

"Let's face it, if this was Rodney King, or some ordinary dude, charged with murder, they'd have his head shaved for the electric chair, dropping gas on his behind on the way to the heaver," Strickland said.

The fascination with his murder trial lies in the constant changing, or "morphing" in the press from an image of a Black American hero to an image of betrayal, Jhally said.

"Simpson's perceived as the 'good' Black we let into our homes and let marry our women," Jhally said.

White America perceives Simpson as a rich, Black man who "whitened" himself and became a hero, convincing himself that this was his nature, Ferguson said. Now that he is on trial his "true self" is surfacing which had previously been hidden behind a White mask, she said.

In actuality, rates of interracial crime are the highest in the country, but that is not the impression the media gives, Lamar Sims, a prosecuting attorney for the Denver District Attorney's Office and a Hampshire alumni, said.

"This kind of thing galls urban prosecutor offices; this is a fairly run-of-the-mill homicide case," Sims said.

Minority groups depend greatly on the images society uses to make sense of them, Jhally said. These kinds of powerful images effect the way Black and White people interact daily.

"If [White America's] good Negro can turn into Frankenstein, then who can you trust," Strickland said. "What (Negro) is a safe one?"

UM alum offers children with HIV fun in the sun

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

For some children, Martha's Vineyard is more than a summer vacation spot.

Once a year, kids infected with HIV come to a camp known as the Vineyard Project seeking friendship, support and most importantly, fun.

Located on the island of Martha's Vineyard off the coast of Cape Cod, the Vineyard Project is the only community- run camp for kids with HIV.

Children from all over the United States come for one week during April to enjoy activities on the island.

"We use the whole island as a campground," said Dave Butler, the camp director and University of Massachusetts alum.

Butler said as director of the camp he maintains a hands- off policy.

"I'm director as far as networking and signing the checks." Butler said, "I'm trying to let the kids and the counselors have it be their camp."

Butler said he would like his volunteer staff to be comprised of UMass students and high school seniors from the local area.

Some UMass students have already volunteered as camp counselors.

"The camp taught me a lot about who I am," said Shannon McGrath, a UMass volunteer counselor at the Vineyard Project last year.

"I definitely want to go back," said UMass Sophomore, Jackye Colligan, "I still think about the kids everyday."

Making use of an all volunteer counselor and support staff helps to create an intimate environment at the camp, Butler said.

In order for this environment to be maintained, there must be adequate one-on-one attention between campers and their counselors. Butler said between 25 and 35 counselors will be needed for next year's camps for this to happen.

Camp days are filled with activities such as beach combing and swimming, but each child has permission to simply relax if he or she feels it necessary.

From April 14 through 21, over 50 children ages 8 to 14 are expected to attend camp next year. This past year about 27 campers participated in the project.

Butler said he will need more volunteer counselors this year because of the expected increase in children attending the camp.

Offered to the children and their parents free of charge, the project is supported by local businesses as well as fund raisers and donations from the people of the island.

Butler, an elementary school teacher, said he became inspired to work with children infected with HIV after learning about a child AIDS victim, Ryan White of Indiana, who died two years ago. He said an essential point to this camp is to provide education about HIV to the community of Martha's Vineyard.

"An important philosophy of the camp is educate the community of Martha's Vineyard about HIV.

"We get the community involved with the camp and try to get the kids out in the town," Butler said.

Children attending the Vineyard Project last year participated in a town dance with the children of Martha's Vineyard as well as a tour of the island and its lighthouses.

"The community helps to run the program," said Butler.

Butler said people living on the island become familiar visitors of the kids during the week of camp.

"I had the people on the island ask if they could visit the kids at the youth hostel," Butler said.

Each year, the town of West Tisbury, located on Cape Cod, donates their youth hostel free of charge for the children to lodge in.

Butler said he has received an overwhelming response from the people of the island wanting to provide activities for children attending this year's camp.

Students interested in volunteering for the Vineyard Project can contact Dave Butler at (413) 625-0162.

Most candidates take day off, but not Roosevelt

Trailing Weld in polls, Dem. candidate holds news conference to attack governor

By Richard Lorant
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld took the day off from his re-election campaign Sunday, a luxury Democratic challenger Mark Roosevelt couldn't afford.

Trailing badly in the polls and in fund raising, Roosevelt spoke at party events in Quincy and Lowell, then held a news conference to attack Weld for "flip-flopping" on welfare reform.

Roosevelt said Weld has done little on the issue since vetoing a legislative welfare reform package earlier this year. The Boston state representative decried Weld's "amazing audacity" for depicting himself as a welfare reformer in television advertisements.

"I am sick and tired of hearing what he's going to do. I'd like to know why he hasn't done it already," Roosevelt told reporters on the Statehouse steps.

Roosevelt said Weld said last year that he favored giving welfare recipients two years to find work and now wants to kick them off the rolls in 60 days unless they find jobs or perform community service. Roosevelt supports a one-year limit.

He also said Weld now supports denying added benefits to families who have children while on welfare, something Weld called outrageous two years ago. Roosevelt says a plan he submitted in August would deny additional benefits.

In addition, Roosevelt said Weld has given $56 million in welfare benefits to state prisoners during his administration.

Weld's campaign did not respond to the specific charges, but lashed back at Roosevelt, calling him a "phony."

"Mark Roosevelt has got to be kidding ... The choice between the candidates on welfare reform is very clear," press secretary Paula Pupeo said.

"Mark Roosevelt has consistently opposed making welfare recipients go to work. He even opposed throwing ex-cons off the welfare rolls. Even now, Mark Roosevelt wants to give welfare recipients a one-year vacation before going to work," she said.

Market Reports

Compiled by Andrew Ferguson

Approaching harvest causes crop prices to fall

CHICAGO (AP) — Grain and soybean futures prices fell modestly Friday on the Chicago Board of Trade as the rapidly advancing harvest brought fresh supplies of corn and soybeans to the market. Some railroads operating in the Midwest said it was difficult to keep up with the demand for railcars to transport the newly harvested crops. U.S. corn and soybean production are at record levels this year. Profit-taking pressured wheat futures after two days of strong gains.

Wheat for December delivery fell 2 1/4 cents to $3.97 1/4 a bushel; December corn fell 2 3/4 cents to $2.14 3/4 a bushel; December oats fell1/2 cent to $1.26 a bushel; November soybeans fell 1 cent to $5.48 1/2 a bushel.

Cattle futures rose for the third straight day on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, reflecting stronger wholesale beef demand and expectations for higher cash cattle prices next week.

Interest rate fears cause stocks to fall

NEW YORK (AP) - Stocks sank for the second consecutive session on Friday, amid persistent worries about higher interest rates and corporate earnings.

The Dow Jones Industrial average fell 19.85 to 3,891.30, bringing the week's loss in the blue chip index to 19.17. The Dow lost 25 points early in the session, attempted a comeback, then resumed its decline even as bonds and the dollar rallied in the afternoon.

Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 3 to 2 on the New York Stock Exchange. Big Board volume totaled 309.35 million shares, down from 326.1 million Thursday.

The sell-off was not confined to blue chip stocks, and broad market indexes declined as well.

The NYSE's composite index fell 0.95 to 255.59. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index declined 1.96 to 464.89. The Nasdaq composite index slid 2.86 to 765.38.

The American Stock Exchange's market value index lost 1.41 to 456.35.

Dollar rallies due to Treasury statement

NEW YORK (AP) —The dollar recovered at home Friday, after teetering to a record low against the Japanese yen in Tokyo, with support from technical market forces and reassuring remarks from the Clinton administration.

A statement from Treasury Secretary Lloyd Bentsen declaring that the government will defend the dollar when necessary helped defuse some of the anti-dollar sentiment that on Thursday drove it down to a two-year lows against the German mark and British pound. Gold wound up the week little changed in worldwide trading Friday. On New York's Commodity Exchange, gold for current delivery settled 50 cents lower at $390.80 a troy ounce. Republic National Bank quoted an ounce of gold also at $390.80, 20 cents lower than Thursday's bid at 4 p.m. EDT.

Currency traders said the dollar got a boost from buying to compensate for earlier sales as dealers covered speculative positions ahead of the weekend.

David Durst, a vice president in Bear, Stearns & Co.'s foreign exchange department, described the gains as part of a technically motivated dollar rally that accelerated in momentum once market participants concluded Thursday's sell-off was overdone.

PVTA bus driver is assaulted at Amherst College shelter; local resident arrested for fight

Jose A. Cruz, an Amherst resident, was arrested Thursday evening after a physical confrontation with a PVTA bus driver, Amherst College public safety officers said.

Cruz was arrested on charges of disorderly conduct and assault, according to Amherst College Public Safety.

Cruz allegedly punched the driver, a tussle broke out and the driver held Cruz down until the police arrived to the scene, officials said.

The incident occurred on a bus that left the University of Massachusetts at 4 p.m. destined for Mt. Holyoke, via Hampshire College. The incident occurred near Amherst College, public safety officials said.

The bus driver had stopped and got off the bus to smoke a cigarette, when Cruz approached him. He asked the driver for a cigarette, the driver refused and Cruz proceeded onto the bus, public safety officials said.

The driver demanded Cruz leave the bus because officials said he may have been drunk.

A driver is entitled to ask anyone heavily intoxicated that is acting in a disorderly fashion to leave the bus.

The Amherst Police Department refused to disclose the bus driver's name.

The PVTA bus company could not be reached for comment.

'Good, cheap food' calling card of Earth Foods

By Jonathan Mullahy
Collegian Correspondent

Employees of Earth Foods say they offer "good, cheap food" which they attribute to their success as a campus restaurant at the University of Massachusetts.

Located in the Student Union, Earth Foods offers a buffet- style restaurant specializing in vegetarian cuisine.

"I get a lot of food for one dollar. There are a lot more choices for food than the dining common for a vegetarian," said Darcy DiGiulio, an English graduate student.

Earth Foods was established in 1976 by a group of students concerned about the fact that at the time there was a lack of healthy, inexpensive food on campus.

"Earth Foods has more of a variety of selections for a vegetarian" said Josh Berman, a sophomore philosophy major.

Earth Foods is non-profit business based on a system of collective management. Students own and run the business with little outside support of the University.

John Beck, a junior English major, has worked at Earth Foods for three years. He said that the University subsidizes Earth Foods by not charging for rent or utilities, but the business does not receives any direct money from the University.

Earth Foods has grown considerably since its beginning. In 1976 it served between 12 and 20 people a day. Now 28 employees serve 600 to 700 people daily.

Earth Foods grosses approximately $1,000 per day. All of the profits are diverted back into the business.

Beck said the restaurant is so popular because Earth Food serves "good, cheap food."

The employees of Earth Foods prefer to be referred to as "Earthlings."

"Every Earthling who works here is equal. We are all managers," said Gwendolyn Roit who has been working at Earth Foods for a year.

As with any organization, Roit said Earth Foods deals with its share of problems.

"Sometimes there are people who do less work, and others who put a lot of effort into [the business]," she said.

The employees of Earth Foods are elected into 17 committees which each deal with a different aspect of the business.

Every Tuesday evening the various committees gather together at a mandatory meeting where problems are settled and ideas are brought forth to the rest of the staff.

One person has the power to block any proposal at the meeting.

"It's one of the slowest ways to run things, but it's a way where everybody can be happy" Beck said.

Roit said Earth Foods provides its employees with valuable experience.

"I have learned more here than I have in most of my classes. I have learned how to run a business," she said.

Politically motivated bomb kills 50 in Sri Lanka

By Niresh Eliatamby
Associated Press

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — A bomb blast at an election rally outside Colombo killed about 50 people Sunday, including the opposition candidate for president and top leaders of his party.

The assassination of Gamini Dissanayake came less than three weeks before the election and just before peace talks were to resume with Tamil Tiger guerrillas. The 11-year civil war has killed more than 34,000 people.

Dissanayake was an outspoken critic of the talks that began this month, and the government had warned him three weeks ago that the Tigers would try to kill him.

The talks scheduled for Monday were called off, said government delegate Navin Gunaratne. No new date was set.

The bomb ripped through the rally on the outskirts of Colombo shortly before midnight. Dissanayake had just finished speaking and was stepping off the stage to greet supporters at his last stop of the day, a Defense Ministry spokesman said on condition of anonymity.

"The bomb was apparently at the front of the stage," said Weerasooriya Wickrema, campaign manager of Dissanayake's United National Party. "It was a very powerful bomb."

There was no immediate claim of responsibility, and police said it was too early to say who might have set the blast. But the Tigers have a long history of assassinations and suicide bombs.

They were blamed for the killing last year of President Ranasinghe Premadasa and of Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in May 1991. Dozens of Sri Lankan politicians and military leaders have also been killed by bombs. A hospital official said about 50 bodies had been brought to General Hospital in Colombo following Sunday's blast, but they were in such bad condition that an exact count was impossible. The Defense Ministry spokesman said more than 200 people were wounded, but he could not confirm the hospital's death toll.

Among the others killed were the United National Party's general secretary, two former cabinet ministers and a member of Parliament, Wickrema said.

Camp to receive help from walk

Vineyard Project hoping to raise $10,000 from six mile walk

A six mile walk to raise funds for kids attending the Vineyard Project will be held this coming Saturday.

A goal of $10,000 from the walk will help to provide airfare, lodging, food, medical supplies as well to support activities such as miniature golf, swimming, and bowling for the children and their families.

"Every penny goes to the kids," camp director Dave Butler said.

The week long camp costs approximately $50,000 to run and is supported chiefly by local businesses on the island which is located off the coast of Cape Cod.

The camp, which is offered free of charge to the children and their parents, continues to be assisted by donations and fund raisers held by the people on the island.

A walk for the Vineyard Project held by the people of Martha's Vineyard raised $5,100 last August.

"Forty-two people were involved in that walk, so I hope with the walk in October we can double the amount of people participating and the amount of money collected," said Butler.

Butler said he hopes to have at least 200 participants involved in the walk.

The six mile walk will begin at 1:00 p.m. at the Amherst Town Common. Registration will begin at 12:30 p.m.

Children from the Vineyard project will be participating in the walk.

If a potential donor has a question, Dave Butler can be contacted at (413) 625-0162.

Building a barn out of tissue paper

Nathan Crick

Jesus Christ paused dramatically, looking over his podium into the viewing audience. "And finally, if you believe in me, I will give you all, eternal life," he said, holding his head high for a moment before folding his hands in conclusion.

The crowd clapped. Someone whistled.

Sam Donaldson turned his eyebrows to Mohammed, who stood on the other side of the stage. "Okay, first question to Mohammed. If elected, what would you do to cure the world of poverty and starvation?"

"Well," began Mohammed. "The reason that people exist in such a state is due primarily from the fact that we allow greed and selfishness to prosper in this world. Some people defend this by claiming that poverty is a natural requirement of prosperity, but I say, let's sacrifice a percentage of our earnings to help these people. Let's give of ourselves and do the right thing."

"Rebuttal to Christ," nodded Donaldson.

"I believe that poverty is a state of this world, yes. I would advise as well people to give of themselves, but more importantly I would give people the hope of something better than this mortal world," Christ paused. "And that thing is, eternal life," he said, gesturing determinedly.

Donaldson's eyebrows moved again. "And Ross Perot, rebuttal."

"Well," said the billionaire, smiling. "Ah don't know what in a pig's tail these two are talkin' about. All's Ah know is, heck, you're poor cause you got no money. And you get money by workin'. Heck, all's ya gotta do is open up that economic hood, throw in a bucket of oil, and you got a world of poor folks drivin' the car."

"Christ," asked Sam. "How do you defend against the allegations that you are promoting irresponsibility?"

"I think they are completely unfounded," said Christ, shaking his head. "What I promote is forgiveness, not irresponsibility. The world is intent on punishment and I simply am emphasizing love."

Ross Perot let out a gaffaw. "Well, heck, way Ah sees it is that you are givin' away the farm with the donkey. You can't go runnin' over people with yer car and then just send em a card in the mail. Just don't work."

"I, personally, do emphasize responsibility," injected Mohammed. "I think the knowledge of what is right and wrong should always be known, and people should let that guide them."

"Now Moe," chuckled Perot. "You know that, heck, you are a choppin' people's fingers off fer sneezin' on the street. Don't know how you can build a barn outta tissue paper. Don't think all those folks you kill in your 'holy wars' are gonna go to your dinner party, no siree."

Mohammed was taken aback. "Well, that's just not true." "Heck, sure is!" said Perot. "You are goin' and causin' wars and that there fella over there is tellin' all the dead folks they are lucky! Yer just not talkin bout what's important, and that's money."

"Now look here, Ross," said Christ. "You don't even know what yer, um, you are talking about. Don't you understand what I mean by eternal life?"

"Yeah, it's some slick insider talk. Yer offerin' somethin we're never gonna see. Yer fulla talk."

"Gentlemen. . ." Sam injected.

"But, but. . ." stammered Christ. "But. . . eternal life! Eternal life, damnit!"

"I think we should get back to the responsibility issue," said Mohammed.

"You mean, who's responsible for that there geee-hahd you pulled over in Kuwait?" Perot spoke into the audience. "Or those hostages Ah had to save way back when?"

"Now that's just plain unfair!" cried Mohammed. "I can't be held responsible for everybody who uses my name!"

"So ya don't believe in responsibility?"

"No, that's not what I meant. . ."

"Gentlemen, please," said Sam again.

"See, you can't get these insiders to talk to the American people rightly. Buncha hootenany, I say."

Christ gripped the podium. "Oh. . . shut up!"

"We must move onto the next question now," said Donaldson, looking them over suspiciously. "The next is to Perot. In relation to accomplishing your goals, what do you think is the major benefit of being involved in public office rather than your current position?"

"Well heck," laughed Perot. "Ah know Ah could be up in that bully pulpit lookin' things over, and up there I could go pickin up all those plans just layin' around the Congress floor and puttin' them in play instead of usin' em as chicken feed. Heck, that's what I'd do."

"Rebuttal to Mohammed."

Mohammed stood for a moment behind his podium, his hands folded in front of him. He looked over at Perot, who was smiling blankly into the camera. He looked at Christ, who was rubbing his temples in visible pain. He looked back at Donaldson's eyebrows.

"You know, Sam," he said, slowly. "I have no idea."

The crowd went wild.

The lighter side of a drooling, sleepy face

Emily Marino

Until about a week ago, if someone had told me news that people I knew were engaged to be married, my typical response was, "Oh, I'm sorry." I never out-right condemned any of these people for taking the big dive, but I was in the habit of explaining why I thought marriage was just a bad idea, all around.

"Who wants to tie themselves down like that," I would quip. "Who wants to wake up and see the same drooling, sleepy face, every morning for the next 18,710 days? There is so much to do in one lifetime, why settle for the monotonous routine of wedding anniversaries, regular dinner times and picking up the dry cleaning?"

You would think, by listening to me, that my parents had gone through a horrendous divorce, and that this is what influenced me to abhor the institution of marriage. But no. Carol and Fabio have been happily married for 26 years, and share a love that has endured countless nasty arguments, and proven its strength in various moments ranging from pure silliness to unmatched sweetness.

I attribute my history of anti-matrimony rhetoric to the fact that, before a Sunday afternoon two weeks ago, I had never been to a wedding. Twenty-one-years-old and never been to a wedding — not quite as bad as sweet sixteen and, well, you know the rest.

I was not particularly excited about my initiation into the world of weddings. I had to drive home that morning and be dressed and in church by 2 p.m., ideally leaving some time for quality family bonding. I did not look forward to my one and a half hour return trip that same evening, but my name was on the guest list and my reception dinner accounted for.

Immediately upon entering the church, my attitude began to change. The woman getting married was my next door neighbor, Dawn. Seeing her nervous, smiling family and excited friends seated in the pews and huddling in the lobby made me realize that the wedding was significant to many more people than just the bride and groom.

As soon as the procession of floral-ly-clad bridesmaids and polished ushers made their way down the aisle, something strange happened. I began to cry.

Now, I'm not the type of person who tends to cry a lot, but as I thought about how these friends of Dawn and Mike (her now-husband) cared so much about them, that they wanted to help them to publicly acknowledge their relationship in this ceremony.

When Dawn entered the church, she was transformed from the little girl with whom I had made pom-poms from trash bags in my backyard, to a beautiful bride, literally glowing with happiness. As she walked past all of the people who have lovingly supported her since childhood, her obvious glee and her wish to share it with us confirmed that Dawn had reached adulthood with confidence and grace.

From that moment, the wedding was a series of attempts to hold back my tears, much to no avail. The vows and reading were touching, and watching Dawn and Mike proclaim their love for one another at the altar, in front of everyone who was important to them, made me realize just how meaningful marriage is.

Marriage, it would seem, is a public confirmation of a couple's feelings. They are proclaiming to friends and family that they love each other enough to commit to the pursuit of the other's happiness, and to undergo with that person the struggles of achieving it.

Marriage is the joining of two families; and while most of us have enough of a time dealing with just our own "beloved ones," it is a commitment to work to be a part of the family of the person you love. It is also a commitment to starting your own family, beginning with the creation of a home.

I know that more times than we would like to believe, the marriage which follows this perfect day is disappointing, dysfunctional, or just does not work out, for whatever reason. I know that the notion of creating a home is idealistic in many ways.

But my mother emphasized that she wanted me to finally attend a wedding because she wanted me to see how wonderful it can be, and realize how rare it is to find such a nice one in these days of drive-through matrimony and high divorce rates.

Though I don't feel that my own wedding bells will be chiming any time soon, I have a whole new respect for marriage. I'm not sure that I am completely reformed, but I will at least think twice before sending a sympathy card to the next of my friends to get engaged.

Faith in the Home Shopping Club

Dave Jastrow

There I was, pleasantly perusing the newspaper when I noticed his name lurking in the headlines.

A strange feeling overcame me all at once. It was more terrifying than being forced to listen to a Stone Temple Pilots ballad. It was more frightening than the bitter aftertaste that lingers after eating the Fisherman's Catch at the dining commons.

There once was a man named Martin Jones.

He was born a crazy radical guy, but he evolved into a crazy normal guy. He pioneered the battle against the intrinsically evil emblem of the University of Massachusetts, the Minuteman. His personal vendetta against the Minuteman symbol was a story picked up by the associated press, national television newscasts, David Letterman, and Rush Limbaugh.

He garnered a small group of renegades like himself who posted "Ban the Minuteman!!" signs all over our campus. In response to Chancellor Scott's announcement that the mascot would not be changed, Jones responded by going on a dramatic hunger strike. Four days later, he ate pizza and the administration gave a collective sigh of relief.

Less than one year later, Jones disappeared from the spotlight, until he discovered a way to gain even more influence on local politicians. He joined them.

He initiated "Operation Restore America," and he made the startling revelation that he made "a terrible mistake." He told his listeners that he planned to make speeches at the historical sites at Lexington and Concord.

Jones even sent invitations to local politicians such as Gov. William F. Weld, Sen. Edward Kennedy, and his political rival, Mitt Romney. This was his way of "coming to terms with my identity as an American citizen," as he explained himself.

Jones sounds like a born-again patriot, trying to restore a nation of cynical nonbelievers. This is ironic, considering that it is individuals like Mr. Jones who cause these disillusions. I cannot even imagine what went through the minds of the people who supported Jones battle against the Minuteman when he explained his startling revelations regarding his newest patriotic stance on America.

His sudden inspiration while watching the movie "Forrest Gump" this summer was quickly converted into a complete reversal of his previous opinions. Now he is a loyal supporter of "this great nation called America."

Jones is suddenly willing to become a symbolic pawn for politicians, who can take his new position and use him as an example of how the youth of America are becoming enthusiastic for the future. The people who followed him before are left to fend for themselves, realizing that Jones will continue to ride the tide of the current trends, until they are no longer considered new. Then, he can allow himself to be inspired once again, perhaps next time from something that is said on the Home Shopping Club.

Once again, Jones can be blinded by the flashes of photographers and the support of local politicians. Maybe if we are truly fortunate, Jones will make his triumphant return to the steps in front of the Student Union Ballroom. There, he can reveal all of the latest revolutionary cures to the social diseases of America.

Hopefully, Rush Limbaugh will be in attendance, as he was for the Minuteman controversy. The only question that still remains is whether or not he will be supporting the words of the occupational protester.

Letters to the Editor

Editorials don't show all sides

To the editor:

The Collegian's unsigned editorial "Peace efforts should continue" (Tues. Oct. 18) demonstrates again how little the people who work at the Collegian know, understand or care about events beyond the borders of the United States.

The editorial discusses the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Yitzhak Rabin and Yasir Arafat, but questions whether Arafat deserves it.

First of all, any prize of "peace" which has been awarded to Henry Kissinger and Menachem Begin is itself open to the most serious questions about how it defines "peace."

But beyond that, it is instructive of the double standards that dog Western media outlets, even ones as lowly as the Collegian, that the kidnapping of one Israeli soldier should place Arafat's credentials in question whereas the Israeli leaders are not held accountable for any of the actions they commit.

Let us begin with the occupation, which seems to have slipped everyone's mind. The fact is that most Palestinians still live under Israeli occupation and apartheid or in exile. Even the tiny autonomous regions are still effectively under Israeli occupation. This occupation is a crime, and the methods used to enforce it are rape and barbaric.

Furthermore, in occupied Lebanon, the Israelis continue to expel villagers from their homes, bomb and kill indiscriminately and rule with the iron fist of colonialism.

The bantustan agreement between the PLO and Israel cannot paper over the horror of these occupations and no amount of American bribery or Scandinavian plaques will satisfy the Palestinian and Lebanese people. Groups such as Hamas and Hizbullah will continue to struggle against Israeli occupation, colonialism, and apartheid and will become increasingly popular because of it.

Of course, none of this can be reflected in the Collegian editorial, because no one on the Collegian Editorial Board can even begin to understand what it has been like for Third World people to struggle against European colonialism.

What can one expect from an editorial that begins by misidentifying the Palestine Liberation Organization as the "Palestinian Liberation Organization?" Simply put, you people don't know the first thing you are talking about when it comes to these issues.

Better stick to basketball.

Reader agrees with column

To the editor:

As I read through Alex Casas' column on Monday, a smile came upon my face. I was thrilled to see someone else had an opinion similar to mine about the gay and lesbian lifestyle on campus, and that he also had the guts to write about it.

It seems that at UMass, the homosexual community can say and do whatever they want to, but if anyone makes a comment against their behavior, then that person is automatically wrong. I applaud Alex for standing up for not only what he believes in, but what most straight males, including myself, believe in. If the homosexual community wants more respect on campus, here's a couple of suggestions.

First of all, realize when you are wrong. The incidents in the Thompson bathroom were simply horrifying. But somehow, glib couldn't see this. They, instead, write into the Collegian saying it's alright seeing two people of any kind having sex, and I certainly don't like to see bodily fluids all over the place.

Second of all, when someone like Alex speaks up for what he believes in, don't automatically start whining about it. Your so called community prides itself in saying that people can say and do what they believe in, which is exactly what Alex did. It's about time someone spoke out against the homosexual community, and hopefully the "community" realize that the way Alex thinks, is the way most of the straight males on campus think.

Athlete says University helps

To the editor:

Last week the Boston Globe printed an article which infringed upon the rights of many members of the UMass Basketball team. In the article there is mention of a "double standard" for athletics here at UMass. Well if this is true, I feel sorry for the non-athletes on this campus. I feel sorry for all the people who are on academic probation with no one who really cares whether they choose option one to work hard and bring up their grades, or option two to head home, because there is a much larger percent of them than athletes on probation.

These are the statistics that need to be looked at. You may think it is bad that there is only an 85 percent graduation rate among athletes, but what if you compare this to the 66 percent graduation rate of the University in general.

Athletics bring a lot to this school, since the basketball team made the NCAA tournament, alumni giving has increased immensely, as have TV rights, and even enrollment in general. As enrollment goes up, the quality of the average student, and the academic quality will also increase, which is good for the University.

The University is doing great things to support its athletes in the academic field, the reason most of us are here in the first place. There are still great opportunities for the student athlete at UMass, as I know. It takes a lot of work to be a student athlete, and not all of it is the student's work. From study halls and tutors, to grade monitoring to see when we need them, every effort is focused on our overall success, not just that in our perspective sports.

The Wedding Present delivers

S'M'A'S'H/THESE ANIMAL MEN EP
S'M'A'S'H and These Animal Men
Vernon Yard/Virgin Records

Just when you thought you were safe....the British press takes you credulity to the limit with its most contrived scene yet— the New Wave of New Wave.

No matter that S'M'A'S'H are probably old enough to have been eligible for the original New Wave, and that they are effectively a karoke version of The Clash to old fart journalists nostalgic for 1977.

Nor that These Animal Men are suspected of being chancers who have appropriated old school Adidas shirts and a drugs manifesto whilst it is whispered they were once a no hope indie-band by another name.

Not that age of image manipulation need matter if the music's worthy of "money, masturbation," as S'M'A'S'H sing on the worthily titled "Lady Love Your (insert English's most grim expletive). " All the attempts at lyrical bite are redundant if you've got bog standard songs, and trying to appear authentic to your favorite punk records means.

Unlike the best of the abundant retro bands about today, you're just sad saps trying to resurrect the corpse of another era without adding anything inventive. Why listen to some hoary old male punk wannabe singing for female self– affirmation when Echobelly, Hole or Liz Phair do it with so much more melody and eloquence?

And when S'M'A'S'H sing of the existential trauma of being either "a junkie or a loser" it now sounds so superficial and cliched, where as if you hear the Sex Pistols or Nirvana, the sex, drugs, and rock n' roll myth/tragedy still means something.

To be fair, These Animal Men are substantially superior, but again their best songs remain very derivative. The amphets–theme of "Speed King" invokes The Small Faces through The Jam to Echobelly again, whilst the best songs on either of these five track EPs "You're Not My Babylon" just may be the utterly English, punk-ish Carter the Unstoppable Sex Machine circa 1991.

With the mega–rise of post–Nirvana punk acolytes like Green Day, these two bands might miraculously make it in the US, though I doubt whether they have the innovation, the songs or the fundamental talent to even sustain their sound (and the fury of their hype) over a full length LP. To paraphrase an Americanism, T'R'A'S'H. D and D– (Martyn Bone)

Trak On Trak-Off

WATUSI
The Wedding Present
Island Records

It seems that by now The Wedding Present should have conquered the miserable, pop void that bands such as The Smiths and Joy Division left behind in the wake of their demise.

Vocalist Gedge has the type of puppy dog voice that lonely suburban boys and girls dressed in black dream of, while the rest of the band manages to toss off pop licks so irresistible, they virtually dance in your head for days.

While The Wedding Present has always been a "singles" band (last year they recorded a new single for every month of the year), Watusi may just be their greatest stab at the pop world yet.

Gone is much of the noise–factor that permeated their 1992 Steve Albini–produced release Seamonsters, and instead seems to be much more of a songwriting sensibility that helps lift the songs out of a possible "forgettable" chasm.

The most memorable tracks on Watusi are the ones where the band shows it is not afraid to shake up the status quo. "Click Click" enters on a trance–like riff, accented by beautiful double harmonies between Gedge and a female back–up vocalist.

"Spangle," the album's most down–beat track, eerily mopes along, dripping with low–key organ and Gedge's almost desperate tone of voice. Since the track appears directly in the middle of the album, it cleverly offsets the buoyancy of the other songs acting as a sort of emotional anchor for whole piece of work.

While the biggest thrill may indeed be the hooks, there is no denying Gedge's poignant and moody lyrics. On most of the tracks he spouts off tales of love and loss so direct they would make even Morrissey, the king of frankness, blush.

With Watusi The Wedding Present have added another memorable chapter to their near perfect back–catalog. And while they might not be the reigning kings of mope-pop yet, they have proved that even in flannel–clad 1994 there is still room for achingly, earnest tunes. A (Matt Audette)

CLUMSY
Samiam
Atlantic Records

Like fellow Berkeley mates, Green Day, Samiam (pronounced Sam–I–Am) play punk rock with pop sensibility. Unlike Green Day, their major label debut, Clumsy, lack the hooks to boost them out of anonymity.

Dubbed "melodicore," Samiam definitely show their sense of melody within a punk framework, yet the songs only come across as lackluster at best.

The songs curiously grow on you but lose you equally as fast through the continual formula of layered guitars, seemingly borrowed from punk predecessors and peers like Sonic Youth, Cell, Vanilla Trainwreck etc.

What lacks on this album though is power. Musically the songs plod along, failing to ever really making any sort of impression. The album also lacks the power of word, as the album's lyrical introspection seems all too serious in its irony.

This is not to say that Clumsy is overly bad, but rather serves as a reminder than a copy of Nirvana's Nevermind is hiding in your collection.

From the growth of punk rock into the mainstream came the exposure of punk rock's mediocrity, and unfortunately Samiam clearly fall into that category.

On the album closer "Time By The Dime," vocalist Jason Beehout sings, "I can't believe it! this is awful/ I've got better things to do with my time." It's too bad they don't tell you this earlier. C (Wayken Shaw)

Modern dancers entice Valley audience as Shapiro & Smith come to Bowker

By Jonathan Ratcliff
Collegian Staff

SHAPIRO AND SMITH DANCE COMPANY
Bowker Auditorium
Oct. 21

A dancer slingshots across the stage, launched from a twisted army blanket held by two other dancers. Another dancer does a running leap high in the air, only to have her forward momentum stopped short in midair by the blanket. Later in the piece, the blanket prop is used to pull, swing and cradle other dancers in a variety of ingenious ways.

The athleticism found in the Shapiro and Smith Dance Company's opening piece, "Dance with Army Blankets" was only a hint at the rest of the evening's performance which included a repertory that spanned the company's entire career.

Several different themes and styles were explored; from the quiet romance of "Two," the duet that was the first piece that Shapiro and Smith choreographed together in 1986, to "Untitled," which is a preview that included the entire seven person company. "Untitled" is a powerful piece that explored a serious theme of pain and struggle; it was evident in the dancing, lighting and musical score. The Collegian was given the opportunity to speak with Danial Shapiro.

"'Untitled' deals with the many holocausts humans have undergone in the past and present. The piece is about trying to find and explanation– what does it take to make something like this happen? What mental gymnastics do you have to do to treat people in a way that you don't see them as human," Shapiro said.

These vast differences in theme in the pieces share an element found in all of Shapiro and Smith's work: exploring the human condition.

"We look at what's going on," Shapiro said. "Everything we choreograph comes out of people, things we see them do. We, (as humans) are all in this thing together, we have so much in common, more than we may realize. You feel a certain way in your life, other people are feeling it or have felt it, too; and here it is on stage."

The dancers in the company moved with such smoothness and grace that the audience's perception of the hardness and solidity of the floor and props was challenged. The energy produced from the potential danger in the leaps and moves was effectively used to add power to the choreography.

Props in the pieces were not obstacles or distractions; they were rather features on the stages landscape that the dancers flowed on and around, utilizing them with natural ease. The props were assigned "Captives" featured a massive wooden cage–like structure which at times was a prison, and others, a refuge. The wooden benches in "To Have and to Hold" served at different times as places for erotic interludes, beds, slides, and coffins.

"Dance, Dance," a "wacked out little duet, very much built on who the dancers are and what they can do," was another lighter piece.

The closing piece to the show was the wildly funny "George and Betty's House", which takes a sarcastic shot at domestic qualities of married life; comically criticizing gender roles, safe sex, and child rearing.

"Humor sets us apart form other dance companies," explains Shapiro. "We are a wonderful blend of humor and pathos, and we have a very athletic repertory, gymnastic and very physical."

Tori Amos woos a sold-out audience during Thursday evening performance

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

TORI AMOS
Smith College
Oct. 20

Tori Amos' sold out show took the stage Thursday night at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall to a frenzied and eagerly awaiting crowd.

Beginning her set with a cover of the Bruce Springsteen hit, "I'm On Fire," it was clear that she had made the song into something completely her own.

Throughout her next couple of songs, "Crucify" and "The Waitress," it was evident that you were never going to be able to tell when she was going to alter the structures of her songs; Pausing, bringing the dynamics down suddenly or playing around with the tempo were not uncommon occurrences. In fact they were what made Amos all that more acoustically pleasing.

Amos' personality as well as her music was on display all evening, as she threw a fireball into the crowd, talked about the stuffed bat hanging above her piano and poured water onto the crowd in front of her to "cool off the moshers."

Even without a band behind her, songs that were recorded with drums and guitar did not lose their intensity.

"Space Dog" and "Precious Things" sounded just as powerful if not more so than the originals on her latest release Under The Pink, and a recorded drum part kept "God" and "Cornflake Girl" at a driving tempo.

Midway through "Precious Things," the alarm system in the building was trippped. Amos paused and asked the crowd if she should keep playing. The audience responded with a tumultuous uproar, after which Amos picked up right where she left off and overpowered the alarm until it shut off.

Another concert highlight included "Bells For Her," played on an upright piano, altered to sound like something out of a Fisher Price catalogue.

During the a cappella "Me And A Gun," the audience was in an emotionally intense silence throughout the entire piece, which was unusual, due to the fact that her performance was disturbed at numerous times throughout the night by audience members yelling things like, "I love you Tori."

Coming back for her second encore, Amos played probably the most anticipated song of the evening, "Winter," preceded by her rendition of the classic Police tune "Wrapped Around Your Finger," – and that is exactly how she held the audience all night long. A

They Might Be Giants to play Smith

COURTESY MICHAEL HALSBAND

They Might Be Giants

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

They might be maturing, but don't write off They Might Be Giants yet. Sure, they may have traded in the drum machine for a full six–piece band on their latest release John Henry, but the two Johns still have plenty of tricks up their offbeat sleeves. Working in more of a "band" atmosphere has given They Might Be Giants more area to maneuver in, as they proved in earlier live performances this year.

Tomorrow night the band will show off their new direction and new tunes as they play at John M. Greene Hall on the Smith College Campus.

While ditching the "duo" status has forced TMBG to lose some of the off the cuff cleverness that was their trademark on earlier releases, they have come up with a new direction and possibly one of their most distinctive releases yet.

"I'm in the unusual position of feeling like we've done a really good job on this album," John Linnell, half of TMBG's founding core, told Billboard magazine. "We were unusually prepared for this record. We had a larger selection of songs to choose from. This is not as ugly a record as we've made in the past."

Being more prepared may have been due in part to the extensive touring TMBG did before entering the studio.

"These songs are road–tested," John Flansburgh told Billboard. "When it came time to make the record, it went very quickly."

Using the same band unit in the studio as they did on the road TMBG have come up with 20 rock–orientated pop songs that expand the band's vocabulary as musicians. Added to the TMBG line–up is drummer Brian Doherty, bassist Tony Maimone (who has also worked with Pere Ubu and Bob Mould), ex–Ordinaries saxophonist and keyboard player Kurt Hoffman, and trumpet player Steven Bernstein.

"I think that this record is different, in that it has a "bashy" rock quality to it that comes directly from our last road experience," Flansburgh told Billboard.

With this new found sound, as well as more high–powered live shows, TMBG have been garnering a larger fan base that may lead to a emergence from the band's current cult– type status. The fact that a gold record was recently awarded to the band for their first Elektra release Flood only emphasizes this fact more, making tomorrow's show all the more anticipated.

Ex–Pixie frontman (and friend to TMBG) Frank Black will open the show with a solo acoustic performance.

They Might Be Giants will play at John M. Greene Hall at 8:00 p.m., Tuesday, Oct. 25. Tickets are $15.50 in advance and may be purchased by calling The Northampton Box Office.

Boyz II Men dispel flash in the pan notion

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

BOYZ II MEN II
Boyz II Men
Motown

When Boyz II Men first appeared on the pop music scene their soulful melodies, killer harmonies, and fresh clean cut look entranced listeners from coast to coast.

Discovered by Bell Biv DeVoe's Michael Bivins, the fabulous four (Wanya Morris, Nate Morris, Shawn Stockman, Michael S. McCary) were quickly signed on to Motown records.

Their debut album Cooleyhighharmony sold more than seven million copies and won the quartet a Grammy in 1991. "End of the Road" and "Motownphilly" were being played on every radio and their melodious voices also earned them the hit song to Eddie Murphy's movie Boomerang.

Now a little older and a little wiser, Boyz II Men have released their sophomore album simply titled Boyz II Men II. Produced by hip hop king Babyface, the group put together an album that has managed to debut in the top twenty of Billboard's pop chart. The first release, "I'll Make Love II You" soared to the top slot of the hit parade and became 1994's fastest selling single. This clearly shows the Boyz II Men weren't just another doo–wop flash in the pan but a group with real talent and voices.

Groups such as Shai, Silk, and All 4 One hopped on the harmony bandwagon riding Boyz II Men's success. Unfortunately when left to their own devices they fell short of the finishing line.

Boyz II Men attribute a lot of success to prayer.

"We pray," said Wanya Morris," We pray a lot. We have a strong belief that the Lord will carry us through, especially since we are doing everything we can to spread his word. He is the author."

The lyrics to "I'll Make Love II You," display the more sensitive side to the group that they try to encompass in all their songs.

"The way we would be with a woman is exactly the way we express it on the album," said Nathan Morris in an interview with Entertainment Weekly. "We don't go out and say, 'Okay, let me smack your booty and flip you,' and all that crap."

Adds Wanya, "I couldn't see disrespecting a woman, than seeing someone disrespecting my mom."

Although the group has rocketed through the atmosphere of success they have managed to keep their feet permanently on the ground. They all still live with good old mom and dad in Philly.

"Water Runs Dry" written by Babyface is a perfect example of the group's ability to expand and explore. Babyface plays a soulful guitar accompanied softly by drums, upright bass, cello, and two violins.

"On Bended Knees" also promises to be another classic hit. Surprisingly enough it also almost never got recorded.

"On Bended Knee" also gives Wanya one of those chances to stir emotion, build emotional momentum, and raise his vocal intensity to a climax that only he reaches among all the male singers on the scene today.

This talent and ability to create something new with harmonies is what separates Boyz II Men from all the rest. Their ideas are always fresh and they never rehash the "same old same old." If anything, Boyz II Men continue to improve and improvise every chance they can to maintain their unique brand of music making that offsets alternative and hip–hop on the airwaves.

Tim Kelley and Bob Robinson are also instrumental in getting Boyz II Men where they are now. It was their insight and guidance that helped the group develop their impressive sound. The songs "Vibin'," "Tryin Times" and "U Know" are products of that talent melding together. Their remake of the Beatles "Yesterday" jumps out at you giving the lyrics new soul.

So exactly what does Boyz II Men do to become a cut above the rest?

"Last time we went into the studio, we didn't know anything about fans, radio, video shows, charts. We just sang songs we loved. This time, we tried to go into the studio with the same attitude. Just singing songs," Wanya revealed.

And sometimes that's all it takes. A

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19) The emphasis today is on planning for the future. You will never get where you want to go if you keep looking back. Call on the experts if you lack good money management skills.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) You are quick to sense what is needed at work. Higher–ups see you in a favorable light. A news report or complimentary message validates your methods.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) Be more outgoing in encounters with members of the public. Sign up for a community project and be as generous as possible towards a charity. Sharing your feelings with loved ones will create new rapport.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) Risks of all kinds should be avoided today. Protect your financial assets by refusing to lend cash. Sharing your home with a newcomer can be difficult.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) Following your partner's lead is a better idea than trying to run the show yourself. Make a point of being exceptionally cooperative. Sharing a favorite hobby with a loved one will double your pleasure.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) Efforts to reach an agreement are best postponed until tomorrow. Calling over the details of you strategy will allow you to perfect a backup plan. Aid stressed-out family members and friends.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) You have the ability to make someone's dreams come true. Champion the rights of the elderly. Be blunt with a family member who has tried to guide you. You must follow your own star.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) Guard against accidents in the workplace. Obeying all safety regulations is a must! A love relationship will flourish if you show your tender, sentimental side.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) Pressure to complete tasks and errands may run counter to your energy level now. Prioritizing and pacing will allow you to get through the list at your own tempo. Enhance your social life by extending invitations.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) Business and professional matters deserve top priority this morning. Stop brooding about old romantic wounds. Your career is your salvation. Landing a special contract or assignment will be quite a feather in your cap.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) A good day to take care of important correspondence. Making the first move in romance gives you a feeling of control. Those on vacation have an opportunity to try something completely different. Be bold!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) Recognize extravagance for what it is. Do not allow friends to intrude on family decisions. Advice or criticism offered by your partner could be a blessing in disguise. Follow your heart. Forget old resentments.

Langevin stars for cross country

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

She arrived at UMass one year ago toting a high school track and cross country resume that ran approximately the length of Al Capone's police record, but could this freshman possibly be an instant asset to the defending Atlantic 10 cross country champions?

In each of her first three weeks as a Minutewoman, Melissa Langevin captured the A-10's rookie of the week honors and she has not looked back since. Langevin has placed first amongst all UMass runners in every race that she has ran since arriving in Amherst.

The secret of her continued success is simple; an unconditional love of her sport.

"I love running. Sometimes my coach thinks I'm even a bit psycho about it," said Langevin, a sophomore from Sturbridge, MA. "It's a really great feeling to see how far you can push your body. I go out there every day and I train really hard, and it's really exciting to see the day of a race what you've accomplished. I love competing and I just love running. People sometimes laugh at that but I plan on having running being part of my life forever."

As an exercise science major, she likely will be running forever, too.

"It's a joy to have someone who's so competitive and willing, and wants to be good as much as she does," UMass Coach Julie LaFreniere said. "She's got the body for it and she does have a pretty good head for it. Sometimes you do get kids with great athletic ability and no head, or the other way around, but they do pretty well for themselves. She has everything you need."

That complete package keeps most opponents wary of a bout with the Minutewomen. However, Langevin, an All- Atlantic 10 selection a year ago, stresses the team aspect of cross country to the highest degree.

"When teammates can run together in a race, and they can run in a pack, you can really help push each other along," Langevin said. "It can also be intimidating to another person because if you're just running by yourself and all of a sudden three girls from another team come by, and they're all together, it makes you feel really alone."

Due to medical problems, Langevin never actually ran track or cross country until the spring of her sophomore year at Tantasqua Regional High School. At the urging of her younger sister Aimee, who now runs for Stanford, the elder Langevin went out for the team and proved to be an overnight success story.

Langevin's insatiable love for running led her to UMass. Seldom does a coach ever become legitimately concerned about an athlete over training, but LaFreniere has to concern herself with the potential of a burn out.

"My job is to hold her back a little bit because she will tend to over do," LaFreniere said. "I've got to pull on the reins and slow the race horse down, not on the course but with the training. I just don't see her running eighty miles a week, but she thrives on it."

Following last season a knee injury prevented her from running until early June. Langevin was forced to redshirt her freshman track season as well, a move that has extended her plans to include a fifth year of college.

Both Langevin and LaFreniere had substantial cause to worry about her knee heading into the 1994 season opener against the University of New Hampshire, on their home course. Langevin abruptly laid to rest any rumors of a potential sophomore jinx, however, as she shattered the UNH course record, with an 18:12 mark.

Langevin's last three races, in fact, are her three fastest times as a Minutewomen. Last Saturday, her personal record [17:46] at the Paul Short Invitational, earned her A-10 runner of the week honors. Talk of Langevin qualifying for the Nationals has repeatedly surfaced.

"I would really like to make Nationals this year," Langevin said. "As a freshman I just missed going. With everything that I've been through, with my injury and everything, and the way I've been racing now, I'd like it. I have a chance so it's just a matter of staying healthy and really wanting it that day because it all depends on that day if you go."

Motivating Langevin should hardly be a problem.

"She needs to be calmed down," LaFreniere said. "I don't have to get her up for anything, I'll try to pull her off the ceiling. She does tend to get too hyped up. I describe her like a cat on a hot tin roof. She's ready to spring off at any minute. I plan on going the whole way with her this year and I think she has the same plans."

The grueling workload required of a cross country runner can run many into the ground.

"It takes a certain type to be a distance runner," Langevin said. "We train extremely hard and go out and do what we do every day. We have to have a lot of respect for ourselves and it takes a lot of dedication and discipline."

Gazing out of her dorm at the often wild nightlife in Southwest, Langevin mentally blocks out many of the sights and sounds.

"My running is my way to get away from all that stuff (social pressures). When I was injured and didn't have it, I was in pretty bad shape. I was pretty down. It's an addiction."

Five minutes later, she limps off with a hamstring pull, and never returned.

How about sophomore defender Erin Lynch? After getting knocked to the ground in the first half, accidently or not, she was practically stepped on. Lynch did return, and played the rest of the game.

What about senior defender Heidi Kocher? She had an ice pack resting on her right shoulder after the match.

Finally, there was junior defender Nikki Ahrenholz. Connecticut forward Ashley Paine, all 5-foot-10 of her, was knocking bodies with Ahrenholz all second half. To go along with it, Paine was talking some serious, unnecessary trash. Some soccer match, huh?

Make no mistake about it, it wasn't only the defenders that were getting mugged. The midfielders and forwards got plenty of that stuff too. A fan in the stands kindly asked, "Should I call the cops?"

So it is no wonder they can't pack the gorgeous Soccer Stadium. Why? They don't play soccer there. The match looked more like a fight for the championship belt.

And when the final buzzer (bell, if you wish) rang, many of the Connecticut players waved their arms in the air in celebration. They won the match - the wrestling match that is.

The records will show the soccer match also went to the Huskies, 2-1. But all involved would be hard-pressed to defend that soccer was actually played on Saturday.

about it."

The teams will very likely meet again in the NCAA regionals. If they do, Donnelly promises that the Minutewomen will have their revenge.

"I think we will see them in the first round," said Donnelly. "And if we do see them again we'll win. I don't have any doubt in my mind, I believe we will be in the Final Four."

The Minutewomen return to action next Saturday, when they take on Atlantic 10 rival St. Joseph's.

So it was back to the down-two drawing board, but only for 13 seconds. Lowell took its largest lead at 3:47, when freshman defenseman Mike Nicholishen scored his first Riverhawk goal on a fine slapshot from the right circle to the top shelf. The usual suspects (Bullock and Sbrocca) picked up assists.

At 12:47, Shannon Basaraba settled the affair by poking in a rebound of Aaron Kriss' point drive, making it 5-1. Nicholishen also assisted on the play.

Bullock concluded the scoring at 14:51 with a great play. Coming through the slot, he kicked the puck onto his stick before wristing it home. Sbrocca was again his linemates' best friend, as he earned the record-tying assist.

Sal Manganaro suffered a bruised patella when he crashed into the goalpost, but Mallen said it is not severe.

■ ice hockey

called on to play a major role on both the power-play and penalty killing units. He was paired with Tom O'Connor as UMass' number one pairing.

O'Connor scored the first goal in Hockey East for the Minutemen. Along with Brad Norton and Mike Gaffney, UMass had three defensemen play their first games as freshmen.

"We learned a lot on defense, we have to get better every day. The talent is so great in Hockey East, we have a lot of hard work to do," O'Connor said.

O'Connor's goal at 3:22 of the third cut the lead to 2-1. Suddenly, the excitement was high on the Minuteman bench. Just when ideas of an upset were brewing, the River Hawks struck back with two goals in the span of 25 seconds. Just like that, the Minutemen were buried.

"When I scored, we were real excited about it. We weren't focused for the next play and the next goal. We just lost our concentration," O'Connor said.

Improving the power-play unit will be a high priority for Mallen in practice this week. Mallen went with many different combinations, trying to find one that worked.

"It's early in the season, we've been on the ice for 14 days," Mallen said. "Things aren't clicking and the right combinations aren't there yet."

"We got a lot to work, some of these things will take a week to work on, some a whole year," O'Connor said.

UMass–Lowell did have the top rated penalty-killing unit in the conference last season. The Minutemen put many shots on Craig Lindsay from the point, but were unable to take advantage of several rebound opportunities.

The Minutemen were penalized 13 times in the contest. UMass put itself in the hole in the first period, yielding two power-play goals.

"A lot of it is playing against upperclassmen, a lot of guys don't know how to take that extra dive. We got roped into a couple of penalties," Mallen said.

"I think our team is going to take a fair share of penalties, we are going to play tough and not back down from people."

Mallen knows what his team needs to work on. This opening night loss is the start of the maturing process. All signs indicate that this will not be a long-term uphill struggle.

"I'm optimistic, I look at the talent on this team knowing what we are getting into with excitement. We have the talent to make this thing go," Mallen said.

Volleyball loses to URI Rams again

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Sometimes hard work is not enough.

Despite a strong effort, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team was defeated by the University of Rhode Island for the second time this season, 9–15, 15–13, 15–9, 15–12 in Kingston, R.I.

It was the WRams who ended UMass' season opening 14 game winning streak earlier this year.

"We had our opportunities," UMass Coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We were never out of the match."

The Minutewomen, now 17–3 overall, 5–3 in the Atlantic 10, fell behind early in the first game as URI jumped out to a 7–2 lead.

Massachusetts battled back, however, and scored the final nine points of the game, including the last five straight off the serve of freshman outside hitter Lesley Nolan, to erase a 9–6 WRams lead and take game one, 15–9.

Nolan, who seems to improve her personal records every match, had another career night leading the team with 20 kills, her highest total since coming to Amherst. She also hit for an impressive .313 attack percentage.

"Our outside hitters played well, but we got annihilated in the middle," Kenny said.

In game two, the WRams (12–7 overall, 7–1 A–10) once again took the early lead, 11–6, only to watch the Minutewomen claw their way back. Eventually, the comeback fell short, and UMass fell 15–13.

The same thing happened in game three, as UMass had to play catch up after spotting URI an 8–2 lead. One more time Kenny's squad made it close, but they could not pull off the win.

Trailing two games to one, UMass came out strong in game four, finally getting the jump on the WRams and taking an 11–5 lead. However, this time it was URI who turned it up a notch, scoring 10 of the final 11 points to take the game 15–12, and the match 3–1.

"We lacked a little bit of intensity at the end on defense," Kenny said.

Sophomore outside hitters Dionne Nash and Giza Rivera also played well for the Minutewomen. Nash had 11 kills and led the team with 14 digs.

"Dionne hit the ball well, and blocked well," Kenny said.

Rivera's 16 kills and 13 digs marked the sixth consecutive match that the sophomore reached double figures in both categories.

UMass knew that stopping the WRams meant stopping their outside hitters, namely Sabrina Pozzi and Kris Normandin, both of whom dominated in their first matchup against the Minutewomen this season.

"I thought we did a better job with their outside hitters," Kenny said. "We were able to shut down Normandin a little."

Normandin did collect 11 kills, but had a low .079 attack percentage. Pozzi shined once again, however, leading URI with 14 kills and a .310 percentage.

"It is now between us and Temple for third place in the conference," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen will next travel to Harvard tomorrow night to clash with the Crimson. Harvard entered the week with a record of 6–9.

"It's the end of a big road swing," Kenny said. "Any time you play at this point in the year, you had better be getting better. We are going to try to put together some more offense. There's no way Lesley and Giza should have 60 swings apiece in a four game match."

On the day of the apocalypse Gail finally revealed to Bridget that she was the one to steal her "Mrs. Pretty" make-up kit in the 3rd grade.

Women's soccer falls to Connecticut

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

STORRS, CONN. — The effort remains there, but the wins just aren't coming.

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was hoping that Saturday's game against the University of Connecticut would be the one to turn its season around and get back on the winning track.

But instead, the Minutewomen lost its fifth game in its last eight, 2–1.

The Minutewomen have had the problem of giving up early goals in its eight game slump and it was no different in Saturday's matchup. Connecticut scored both of its goals in the first five minutes of each half.

Massachusetts	1
Connecticut	2

The Huskies got its first goal 5:05 into the game when sophomore forward Ginny Woodward received a pass from freshman midfielder Sarah Barnes and scored.

Connecticut then scored its second goal three minutes into the second half as freshman forward Jan Carabino scored on an assist by junior forward Ashley Paine making it a 2–0 game.

The Minutewomen had its share of chances but like every other game of this slump, they could not catch a break.

With 33 minutes left to go, still down 2–0, sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers had a great chance to put the Minutewomen on the board. Her shot was a bullet but it ended up smacking the crossbar hard.

Just inches away from a score.

"I'll tell you what, I can still hear that crossbar twanging," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said about Myers shot.

That miss would prove to be a big one after UMass finally got a score with 18 minutes left. Junior forward Nicole Roberts used her tremendous speed to beat a defender to the ball and took the shot from about 20 yards out to get the score.

That was her eighth goal of the season and it added to her team-leading point total of 19, along with her three assists.

"I really felt like we created more than enough to take this," Rudy said. "Actually, I felt fairly good. I felt like we carried a bunch of the play today. We've been doing that all year, getting in and around but not getting it finished off."

This loss proved to be extra painful for the Minutewomen.

Early on in the match, freshman defender Erica Iverson injured her hamstring and had to be removed from the game. That loss forced UMass to move Julie Magid back on defense and Sandy Shimogaki came into the midfielder's position. Iverson will be out for an indefinite amount of time.

"We really don't need it [the injury] at this stage right now," Rudy said. "We're tired and beat up and they're [the team] down. We're emotionally down. It really hurt us a lot. We looked at all sorts of formulas and that was a hard one to predict because she's such a strong athelete."

The Minutewomen almost lost another key player soon after Iverson left. Sophomore defender Erin Lynch went down with about 22 minutes to go in the first half and stayed down for about a minute. Lynch came out of the game and UMass played minus one player for about a minute and a half until Lynch was ready to come back in.

"We're trying to find ways to kick them out of this," Rudy said. "The hard part is when you get into a bit of a slump, with the way the season of collegiate soccer is, there's no breaks in it. It's just match after match after match. It just goes on and on and on. It just never ends. And it's hard to get some of the correcting that you need to do done."

If the Minutewomen (10–5, 4–0 Atlantic 10) want to go to the NCAA's again, they are going to have to find a way, and find it quick, to break this slump.

"At halftime, we tried to pump everyone up," Rudy said. "We looked at everyone in the face and asked them the same question, 'Do you think you can do it?' and they all said 'Yes.' And I still think we can."

"We're trying as hard as we can, our intentions are as good as they can be," Rudy said. "These are good kids. It's just not working out for them right now. They deserve much, much better."

After the game, in light of the negative publicity towards UMass in the Springfield Union News, Rudy refused to speak with Union News reporter Gene O'Donnell.

Match looks more like wrestling than collegiate soccer

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. — The Soccer Stadium at the University of Connecticut is one fine facility.

A long, carpeted press box stretches from almost one end of the field to the other. The sound system has speakers set up at all angles, and on both sides of the field. The capacity is 8,000–plus.

This soccer set–up certainly marvels the football set–up just down the back road, where even Notre Dame football coach Lou Holtz couldn't pack 'em in on Saturday. The elder Holtz was there to watch his son Skip, who on Homecoming Day was trying to get his Huskies back on track against URI.

They couldn't pack 'em in at the Soccer Stadium either, and the fans that did attend might have been fooled. It seems they advertised a soccer match instead of what was really taking place – a "no holds barred" wrestling contest.

In this corner, the No. 1 team in the Northeast region, with a No. 6 national ranking, the University of Connecticut.

And do you know what? When Connecticut came onto the field, the public address announcer hit play on a tape that blared music quite similar to the music Randy "Macho Man" Savage used to play when he came to the ring.

And the opponent, with a No. 4 ranking in the Northeast region and a No. 10 national ranking, the University of Massachusetts.

It was clear early on that the referee would turn his back to the rough and tough play. Connecticut still received 13 fouls to Massachusetts' one, but it easily could have been a 35–5 split in favor of the Huskies, who as it is, had twice as many fouls than shots (six).

For safety concerns, the referee probably should have taken the orange flags staked into each corner on the field, and replaced them with turnbuckles. But then again, knowing Connecticut's tactics, a player probably would have eaten one, a la George "The Animal" Steele.

When there was some soccer played, Massachusetts actually controlled the play. But, unfortunately for the Minutewomen, there was very little true soccer played.

Take just about seven minutes into the match for example. Freshman defender Erica Iverson collides with a Connecticut player at the top of the goal box.

U.S 'Nationals' win Head of Charles

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Ring in the new, ring out the old. That was the theme, with a handful of exceptions, as some 4,600 rowers in 1,045 boats competed Sunday in the 30th annual Head of the Charles Regatta.

The U.S. National heavyweights, fresh from a rare victory in the world championships last month, won the men's eight-oared title. America's 1984 Olympic silver medal winners finished far back in a 10th reunion.

Xeno Muller, 21, a Brown University undergrad from Switzerland, lived up to his billing as the 1994 World Cup champion, winning the men's championship singles, while dethroning three-time champ Greg Walker.

Unheralded Marnie McBean, a former Canadian Olympic standout from Hamilton, Ont., won the women's singles title as Anne Marden didn't enter after winning seven times in the last eight years. Cheered on by a crowd of 250,000 people who lined both banks of the Charles River, the rowers competed against the clock, covering a winding three-mile upstream course.

There were ideal conditions for the first 5 1/2 hours in the daylong racing. However, the water became choppier in overcast weather in early afternoon. Then heavy rain hit, annoying rowers in the singles and eight-oared races, which ended the 36-event competition.

The U.S. National crew, which won the world gold medal at Indianapolis on Sept. 18, got together again on Thursday, shook off rust, and won in 14:11.08.

The U.S. boat was strong despite being relegated to a No. 26 start, passing three boats along the way.

Brown, rowing without No. 7 oarsmen Jamie Koven - a member of the national boat, was second in 14:18.93. It was its first loss in more than two years.

Defending champion Vesper Boat Club of Philadelphia, winner in four of six previous years, was third in 14:32.11.

The 1984 Olympic runnerups, calling themselves the Sterling Boat Club, finished 22nd in 15:27.26.

Muller, who has won virtually every major singles title except the Olympic Gold Medal, captured his first Head of the Charles victory in 17:47.09, far off the record. John Riley Jr. was second in 17:48.52. Walker, the leadoff rower in the event, was fifth in 18:08.07.

McBean won the women's singles in 19:10.58. Lindsay Burns, of Big Timber, Mich., was second in 19:28.76.

The Boston Rowing Center repeated as women's eight champion, easily outrowing Yale in 16:07.40.

Only three records were set. The men's club fours was won by the Bulldog Rowing Club of Connecticut in 16:41.85, beating the old record of 16:42.28 set by Peru last year.

The U.S. Naval Academy set a record of 16:23.82 in the men's youth fours, shattering the old mark of 16:26.60 set by the Hanian B.C. Boat Club in 1984.

The Boston Rowing Center won the women's doubles in 17:59.29, erasing the record of 18:06.04 by the Cambridge Boat Club in 1992. Stuyvesant Pell, 63, of Princeton, N.J. won the men's veteran's singles for the fourth year in a row in 20:37.26.

And Ernestine Bayer of Stratham, N.H., at 85 the oldest rower in the big field, finished fifth in a corrected time of 31:49.98 in the women's veteran's singles. The event was won by Laurette Rindlaub, 60, of Riverside, Conn. in 29:01.05.

Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

Soccer inches closer to title

Now it is just one win or tie away.

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team racked up another Atlantic 10 victory Saturday, defeating the University of Rhode Island 4–2. With the victory, Massachusetts (9–5–1 overall, 5–1 in the A–10), put itself in position to win the A–10 regular season championship if it can beat or tie St. Bonaventure at home on Friday.

R.I.	2

The championship would be the first in men's soccer history.

In Saturday's match against the Rams, the Minutemen found themselves up against a team that needed a win in order to get a birth in the Atlantic 10 tournament. To that end, Rhode Island came out with an aggressive offensive attack. They totaled 19 shots on net but only came up with two goals despite its offensive barrage.

The Rams jumped on the scoreboard first, when Paulo Dos Santos scored at the 9:09 mark. But Massachusetts then erupted for three unanswered goals in the next 20 minutes. Defender Karstin Bremke took an assist from midfielder Colin Johnson to tie the game at one at 20:30.

The Minutemen then got goals by midfielder Kevin Martin on a pass from forward Hossein Giahi and by forward Mike Butler, who was assisted by Kevin Martin. Butler's goal proved to be the game winner, as Rhode Island was able to muster only one more goal. Midfielder Mike Doyle got Massachusetts' last goal at 76:00.

Massachusetts Coach Sam Koch said before the game that this would be their biggest game of the season. He credited his team for beating a Rhode Island team that had its backs to the wall.

"I am definitely pleased. We are now 5–1 in the A–10 with one game to go," Koch said. "I think the fact that we were able to come back even though we were down 1–0 early in the game shows a lot of character in these guys. I am very pleased with where we are now."

The win featured strong performances from players Koch has counted on all season long. He credited Bremke for playing well despite being fatigued and Martin for being a catalyst offensively.

"Karstin had a good game even though he was tired. He did a good job of keeping the midfield together," he said. "Kevin Martin had a great goal that definitely came at a time when we needed it. At that time in the game it could have gone either way."

Goalkeeper Mark Wolf held the Rhode Island offense at bay for most of the game. Needing to win at all costs, the Rams made an all out offensive assault.

"Rhode Island has two of the best frontrunners we have played against," Koch said. "They took shots and they definitely put a lot of pressure on us, but he [Wolf] did a good job."

Now that the Minutemen are at the brink of winning their first regular season championship, Koch said that it is nice to see that the soccer program has improved so much in the past few years.

"We are now one game away from a championship which is something that this team has never done. Four years ago people said that Massachusetts wouldn't be able to compete in the A–10," he said.

Koch credited his seniors for being the foundation of the rebuilding process and for being team leaders.

"In Mark Wolf, Mike Doyle, Joel Pittman, Eric Gruber, Hossein Giahi and Joe Maruca we have a solid group of seniors," Koch said.

Massachusetts' next game will be at home Tuesday against Holy Cross. Although it is not an A–10 game, Koch said he does not fear a let down because he said last year's loss to the Crusaders is still fresh in the players' minds.

Lowell wins first round of state hockey bout

By Ted Kottler

BILLERICA— When the first goal came at last, it held even more than its obvious significance. Tom O'Connor's strike at 3:22 of the third period brought the University of Massachusetts hockey team within one goal of the host, the University of Massachusetts–Lowell. It was only 2–1, and this was UMass' first ever Hockey East game. But the margin didn't last.

UMass Lowell	6
UMass Amherst	1

The Riverhawks went on to score four unanswered goals to bury the Minutemen, 6–1, Saturday at the Tully Forum. UMass had extreme difficulty generating any sort of offense, as the numbers showed: it was outshot 45–30, and went 0–for–13 on power plays.

UMass kept the raucous, sellout crowd of 3,047 (Lowell's largest draw since 1983) at bay during its first few shifts, leaning heavily on aggressiveness and keeping the puck out of its own end. But Lowell was soon rewarded with a man advantage, as Mike Evans was sent to the box for interference at 3:12.

At 3:43, Christian Sbrocca put a lovely centering pass on captain Jeff Daw's stick, and Daw promptly tucked it past Dave Kilduff. Greg Bullock also assisted on the goal and Sbrocca's assist was the first of five, which tied a Hockey East record.

With Dennis Wright penalized for hooking, Bullock drove a shot from the left faceoff circle to the far post for a 2–0 Lowell lead at 9:29. Defenseman David Mayes and Sbrocca earned assists.

There would be no scoring for the next 34:53, just a lot of whistles and busy goaltenders. Each side drew seven infractions, but neither power play clicked as Kilduff stopped all 16 shots he faced and Lowell's Craig Lindsay turned away 13. Bullock seemingly made it 3–0 at the 6:11 mark, but the apparent goal was disallowed due to a Riverhawk in the crease.

UMass had three separate 5–on–3 situations and Lowell had one in the middle stanza, but little was mustered despite constant fiddling with the power play units by UMass coach Joe Mallen and Lowell's Bruce Crowder.

"Everything's a learning experience for this team," Mallen said. "It's just so early, and we need to work on [the power play]. I really need to sift some guys in and out of the lineup, so I know who can play with whom."

In its first game in the Hockey East, the University of Massachusetts hockey team lost to UMass–Lowell, 6–1.

Kilduff made the most crucial of his career–high 39 saves at 8:44 when he dove on a puck only inches from trickling over the goal line.

It looked like UMass' long–awaited first goal came four seconds before it actually did. At 3:18, Tom Perry walked right in on Lindsay and stuffed home his own rebound, but the referee ruled Lindsay had control, much to Mallen's dismay.

Though the bulk of its shots to the 3:22 mark were distant and futile, that did not stop O'Connor from teeing up again at the top of the left circle. The shot was labeled for the top right corner, Lindsay gloved it partially, only to see it wobble into the net. Blair Manning was credited with the assist of UMass' first Hockey East goal.

"It's great to get one under my belt, no doubt," O'Connor said.

The Minutemen tasted contention for a mere 12 seconds. At 3:34, Kent State transfer David Dartsch collected a rebound Kilduff never meant to have, then deposited the vulcanized rubber over the fallen goalie. Bullock and Sbrocca assisted their line's left wing.

"I just dropped down and thought I had it, but obviously I didn't," Kilduff said. "That's a lack of concentration on my part. I've got to work on some things."

Loss is first step in a learning process for Minutemen

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

BILLERICA — This was just the first step in the development of a Hockey East team.

The University of Massachusetts lost to UMass–Lowell 6–1 on Saturday. However, this first season in Hockey East is about learning and improvement, not wins and losses.

"I'm so proud of the guys, we worked hard all night," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "It was a 2–1 game with 12 minutes to go. If we could have just finished up stronger it would have been a hell of a game."

There were many facets of the game that illustrated where improvement was needed. The power–play was nonexistent, the team took unnecessary penalties, and defensive breakdowns did occur. Along with the negatives did come flashes of brilliance.

Goaltender Dave Kilduff stopped 39 shots, a career high, but was under siege all night by the River Hawks. Kilduff, often faced shots from the slot and did not have a chance to react on at least two of the goals.

"Kilduff played really well tonight. Our goalies need to play well and give us a chance to win, I thought David did that tonight," Mallen said.

Along with solid goaltending came good penalty–killing. Several times the Minutemen held off the River Hawks, stopping five–against–three advantages.

"Both teams have five on three's, we held them off, and they have a talented unit," Mallen said.

Throughout the season the defensemen will be under constant pressure against the high–powered Hockey East offenses. The River Hawks applied that pressure, beginning the trial–by–fire for the Minuteman defense.

UM pounded at Delaware

By Michael Lewis
Special to the Collegian

NEWARK, Del — "I didn't think anyone could ever do that to us."

Those were the words of shell–shocked University of Massachusetts Coach Mike Hodges after Saturday's 52–14 debacle at Delaware on Saturday afternoon.

Massachusetts	14

The Minutemen [4–3 overall, 3–2 in Yankee Conference] suffered their worst loss of the season, and all the momentum they had gained after upsetting William & Mary two weeks ago has now been eradicated.

"I thought we were prepared today, but we just got totally outplayed," Massachusetts senior defensive tackle Ben Albert said. "They took it to us today."

Delaware [4–3, 3–3 in YanCon] used a powerful running game and efficient passing to shred the Minutemen defense for the most points allowed since a 1987 loss to Holy Cross.

Things started going downhill for Massachusetts early, but the turning point was clearly at the end of the first half. With the Fightin' Blue Hens leading 21–0, the Minutemen defense finally started to play well.

After junior quarterback Andrew McNeilly [9–21, 85 yards passing on the day] was intercepted by Hens' safety Kenny Bailey, the Massachusetts defense held Delaware to five yards on three plays.

Facing a fourth and five from its own 45 with 11 seconds left in the half, the Fightin' Blue Hens tried a desperation play to get into field goal range. Delaware QB Keith Langan heaved a pass to halfback Pat Williams, who caught the ball at the 15, broke a tackle, and scampered into the endzone as the clock expired.

"What bothered me about the play was that maybe we didn't play hard on that particular play," Hodges said. "I was disappointed, but the kids never gave up."

Adding to the Massachusetts frustration was the supper performance by junior fullback Rene Ingoglia. The Minutemen co–captain and All–America candidate, who came into the game ranked third in the nation in rushing, was repeatedly bottled up by the Fightin' Blue Hen defense.

Ingoglia was held to only 11 yards in the first half, and wound up finishing with 86 yards on 21 carries and two touchdowns.

"They have a good defense, but we just didn't execute," Ingoglia said. "We've got a young unit, and we've got to keep our heads up."

The lone highlights for Massachusetts came in the third quarter with Delaware up 35–0. McNeilly led the Minutemen offense on a 69–yard drive that culminated in Ingoglia's first touchdown.

But other than that, it was a day to forget for the Minutemen. It's playoff hopes dealt a severe blow, Massachusetts will try to recover Saturday at home against Boston University.

"We just got whipped in every phase of the game today," Hodges said. "At the end, I was really looking for the fast forward button on the clock."

Game notes:

•The win was sweet revenge for Delaware, who lost 43–29 in the Massachusetts homecoming a year ago.

The Blue Hens entered last year's game ranked fourth in the NCAA Division I–AA poll, but fell sharpley after falling to UMass.

Delaware fumbled seven times last year leading Raymond frustrated.

"This is not a happy day for me," said Raymond. "It's one of those bad days at Black Rock. Everytime we started something, something bad would happen."

The Minutemen won that game on the ground setting a school record of 476 yards rushing on the day. UMass' run heavy offense only gained 133 yards yesterday, which clearly led to the loss.

The Minutemen finished with 244 total yards compared to Delaware's 538.

Kelly's goal in double overtime seals upset of Minutewomen

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn — Before taking the field every game, the No. 8 University of Connecticut field hockey yells "Find a way to win."

Yesterday afternoon they did just that, as the Huskies upset the No. 4 University of Massachusetts Minutewomen (10–2–3) 1–0 in double overtime.

With 3:26 remaining in the second overtime, senior All– American Kristin Kelly collected a Sarah Rahn pass off of a penalty corner a drove it past UMass goaltender Hilary Rose to give the Huskies the victory.

"It was a well executed corner," UConn Coach Nancy Stevens said. "We'd been using it several times during the game but we weren't executing. I say give the ball to the senior All–American in the overtime, and I think she's going to come through."

The victory was a huge step toward the post season for the Huskies.

"We dropped a tough one on Tuesday to UNH," said Stevens. "We really needed this to prove that we are a top ten team. We needed it a lot more than they did. It was a must win for us."

"It was a very hard defeat to swallow," said Rose. "Especially in the second overtime, when really we should be playing safe hockey."

This did not look like the same Minutewomen team that has enjoyed so much success in recent weeks. They appeared tentative in the role of the favorite instead of the underdog, which they had become so comfortable with.

"We got tentative because we played to not lose," said Massachusetts Coach Megan Donnelly. "We realized the pressure of being the higher ranked team."

The UMass offense had trouble getting on track all day. In the entire first half, they only had one shot on Husky goalie Tricia Betts. The wet grass rendered the UMass penalty corner ineffective throughout the game.

Rose has always been a roving goaltender, coming out of the net to play the ball, but she took that to a new level yesterday. The sophomore keeper frequently ventured way out of the net to kick the ball out of harms way.

As she has in several games this season, Missy Sweeney came off the bench in the second half to provide a lift to the UMass offense. She forced the UConn defense into crucial errors that created two penalty corners for UMass, but the wet grass kept the Minutewomen from even getting a shot off.

Penalty corners seemed to be the only source of offensive opportunities in the second half, but neither team could convert, sending the game into overtime.

"The field conditions hurt UMass' corner execution," said Stevens. "They have a great corner shooter [Natalie Hart], but when you get on a grass field in the last two weeks of the season, I think that really hurts corner execution. That really helped us because their corner is usually outstanding."

UMass, despite their previous success in sudden death, was not impressive yesterday.

The first overtime featured the defensive play of the game as senior midfielder Colleen Duffy dove and swept away a Rose Aspelin shot that had trickled by Rose.

In the second extra period, UConn dominated the play, keeping the pressure on the UMass defense and earned two penalty corners with less than four minutes to go. The second of those corners was the finisher for UConn.

"We needed a little spark in overtime and we didn't have it today," said senior co–captain Danielle Borges.

Although the loss was a frustrating one for UMass, the players are confident that they will rebound.

"We'll be all right," Rose said. "It's a step backwards, but not a leap backwards. We'll be all right."

"A loss opens your eyes and makes you work harder," said Borges. "No one likes to lose. We were happy being fourth and we want to work our way back up there again."

"It was not a big thing, we just played tentative," said Donnelly. "If we learn form it we'll be even better. We have to make sure we address it, but we aren't going to get to down

Weld calls Roosevelt a 'phony' as they prepare for the debate

By Richard Lorant
Associated Press

BOSTON — Debate week starts today with a television face-off between the Democratic and Republican candidates for lieutenant governor.

The debate at the New England Cable News studios in Newton will be the second for Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci and Democratic challenger Robert Massie.

Cellucci's boss, Gov. William F. Weld, and challenger Mark Roosevelt meet for the second time on Wednesday, sandwiched by Tuesday and Thursday debates between Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Republican challenger Mitt Romney.

On Sunday, Weld took the day off from the campaign, but it was a luxury Roosevelt couldn't afford.

Trailing badly in the polls and in fund raising, Roosevelt spoke at party events in Quincy and Lowell, then held a news conference to attack Weld for "flip-flopping" on welfare reform.

Roosevelt said Weld has done little on the issue since vetoing a legislative welfare reform package earlier this year. The Boston state representative decried Weld's "amazing audacity" for depicting himself as a welfare reformer in television advertisements.

"I am sick and tired of hearing what he's going to do. I'd like to know why he hasn't done it already," Roosevelt told reporters on the Statehouse steps.

Roosevelt said that Weld said last year that he favored giving welfare recipients two years to find work and now wants to kick them off the rolls in 60 days unless they find jobs or perform community service. Roosevelt supports a one-year limit.

He also said Weld now supports denying added benefits to families who have children while on welfare, something Weld called outrageous two years ago. Roosevelt says a plan he submitted in August would deny additional benefits.

In addition, Roosevelt said Weld has given $56 million in welfare benefits to state prisoners during his administration. Weld's campaign did not respond to the specific charges, but lashed back at Roosevelt, calling him a "phony."

"Mark Roosevelt has got to be kidding ... The choice between the candidates on welfare reform is very clear," press secretary Paula Popeo said.

"Mark Roosevelt has consistently opposed making welfare recipients go to work. He even opposed throwing excons off the welfare rolls. Even now, Mark Roosevelt wants to give welfare recipients a one-year vacation before going to work," she said. "Bill Weld thinks welfare recipients should go to work right away."

Roosevelt said he raised about $250,000 Saturday at a luncheon attended by Vice President Al Gore.

In the senatorial race, black ministers and elected officials voiced their support for Kennedy's re-election bid after a meeting Saturday in which they aired their concerns to Kennedy's wife. The results of the meeting with Victoria Reggie Kennedy were no surprise.

Kennedy, a 32-year Senate veteran, is one of Congress' leading liberals and a longtime supporter of civil rights laws and federal anti-poverty programs. Romney is a venture capitalist with no political record.

But some of the pastors at the meeting said Sunday they were worried that the Kennedy campaign had waited so long to get together with them.

"What I told Vicki Kennedy was that the meeting we held was months too late," said the Rev. John Borders, who preaches to 800 people on Sundays at the Morning Star Baptist Church in Boston's Mattapan section.

His concern was echoed by the Rev. William Dickerson, pastor of Roxbury's Greater Love Tabernacle Church of God in Christ, who said he expected voter turnout in the black community to be low to average.

"There are only a few Sundays left before the election," said Dickerson, who said he would encourage his 200 active members to vote.

Taxing 'unfriendly to business'

Tsongas, Silber and Weld team up against new proposal

By Jonathan Yenkin
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld and Boston University President John Silber may be at odds with each other politically, but they agree that a proposed graduated income tax would be bad for the state economy.

Weld, Silber and another prominent political leader, former U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas, made a rare display of unity Monday in criticizing the proposal which will appear on the Nov. 8 ballot. They said the measure, which would set higher tax rates on upper income groups, would further damage the state's already-expensive business climate, particularly by raising taxes on thousands of small businesses.

"One should consider how many jobs will be lost in the state as a result of passing this tax, not how many rich people you believe you're going to get," said Silber, who won the 1990 Democratic nomination for governor but lost to Weld.

But sponsors of the ballot proposal said critics have offered no proof showing where a graduated tax has hurt the economy of any other state that has such a system.

James Braude, head of Tax Equity Alliance for Massachusetts, said the plan will provide $600 million in tax cuts to the middle class, which "can hardly be described as damaging, except to those whose only concern is their own personal bottom line."

The graduated income tax proposal will appear in the form of two questions on the Nov. 8 ballot. The first would change the state constitution to abolish the current flat-tax system; the second would set the actual rates for different income groups.

Under the proposal, taxes would be cut for all couples making less than $101,000 and individuals earning less than $62,000, proponents say.

But Tsongas, who presented himself as a pro-business Democrat when he ran for president in 1992, said the proposal reinforces an image that Massachusetts is unfriendly to business.

"This is not an issue about taxes to me," he said. "This is an issue about business climate."

While both sides agree that the proposal won't raise taxes for the vast majority of small businesses, which typically pay income taxes as individuals, critics say those that would get hit with higher taxes are the firms making the most money and creating jobs. The tax questions represent a "poisonous threat to our economic recovery," said Weld, who was also joined by a pair of fellow Republicans, Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci and state Treasurer Joseph Malone.

Extra computers and Internet services bring additional opportunities to students

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Correspondent

At the University of Massachusetts, computers can be found all over campus — from dorm rooms to classrooms. Some academics even believe computers may replace textbooks in the future.

At the University there are classes in many different departments which are taught with the aid of the computer.

In the math department computers have been used for the past 15 years to aid in the teaching of classes, according to math professor Murray Eisenberg.

Currently, Eisenberg is using a new set of Apple PowerPC Macintoshes to teach a freshman and sophomore calculus program, which focuses on teaching students how to solve complex problems through the use of computers.

At the University 30 to 35 percent of the students have computers on campus, according to Duncan Chesley..

While the math department is using computers regularly, Eisenberg said every student will need a personal computer at some point to fully bring computer use into educational settings.

"Computers are not going to permeate education until every student has one of their own," Eisenberg said.

Computers assist English classes

The English department also uses a system of networked IBM personal computers to teach the freshman writing program, according to Marcia Curtis, deputy director of the writing program.

"In [English Writing Program] 111 and 113 computers are used as the main tool of writing," Curtis said.

Students use the personal computers to write all of their work, and even use it to peer edit the work of other students.

Some teaching assistants use the computers to hold discussions in class, according to Curtis.

Curtis said the program started about eight to 10 years ago.

Curtis also said about five years ago the English department switched over to the networked IBMs.

A recent addition to the writing lab is giving students access to the Internet, according to Curtis.

Curtis said she also hopes one day every student will have their own computer.

At the University 30 to 35 percent of the students have computers on campus, according to Duncan Chesley, director of Computing Administration at the University Office of Information and Telecommunications.

The University offers personal computers for use in various areas of the campus.

There are 72 IBM compatible PC's and 41 Macintoshes which the University operates, according to Chesley.

At UMass, conventional modems can not be used because of a digital phone system. Instead the University administers terminal adapter units (TAU).

Approximately 1,469 students have TAUs, according to Karen Cyr, housing telecommunications assistant.

The University also offers internet services to students. According to Chesley there are about 6,237 active users who have used the Internet services from July 1 to Oct 3.

The Internet allows students to acquire data from various sources of remote computers.

Computers move slowly to replace texts

A recent study conducted by the Association of American Publishers suggested computers have a long way to go.

Professor and students in introductory course were surveyed for the study to determine what they thought the likelihood of the computers replacing textbooks in the near future would be.

Although both professors and students agree that textbooks are an effective way of delivering course material, the study suggests that students feel that computer technology holds promises in the near future.

"I feel that there is a slow move to computers, but it won't replace text in the near future," said Heather Swiniarski, junior math major.

James Lichtenberg, AAP spokesman, said a lack of appropriate software and lack of training on the part of professors is the reason why computers have not become as widespread in higher education then expected.

Former University student's death still under investigation

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Amherst police are currently investigating the death of a former University of Massachusetts student earlier this month.

Kevin G. Carroll Jr., 21, of 1010 North Pleasant St. was pronounced dead upon arrival at Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton on Oct. 5.

He withdrew from the University due to financial reasons and was working in the area to save money to come back to school.

The Amherst Police Department said the case is under investigation and refused to comment.

Scott Souva, Carroll's former roommate, said he found Carroll lying unconscious next to the phone with the shower running in the other room.

His spleen allegedly burst from a fall Carroll had taken on his way into the shower, Souva said.

Cooley Dickinson Hospital officials refused to comment.

"We don't know how it happened," Souva said. "He must've hit something; he had a bruise and a scrape on his head."

Carroll had dialed 911 but was unable to give his full address, Souva said.

"The dispatcher sent the ambulance to Puffton, because he assumed that was what he was talking about," Souva said. Puffton Apartments are also located on North Pleasant Street.

Carroll had been sick with mononucleosis for a week prior to his death, Souva said.

Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton first diagnosed Carroll with strep throat, Souva said. He also said the doctors prescribed Carroll Percocet and another antibiotic.

Nat'l task forces fight religious right

Local coordinator to give presentations on anti-gay initiatives

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

With anti-gay referendum questions appearing on Nov. 8 ballots in Idaho, Oregon and Alachua County, Fla., it is clear that the religious right is in the midst of a mighty battle against homosexuality, bisexuality and other "moral evils."

To combat this attack, the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force has launched the Fight The Right Project. On Oct. 26, Sue Hyde, coordinator of the campaign, will be giving two presentations focusing on anti-gay ballot initiatives and strategies to fight them and the religious right.

The first presentation, "Why does the right-wing hate homosexuality?" is part of the GLB Studies Brown Bag Lunch Series, will take place in Campus Center room 904- 908 from noon to 1:30 p.m.

The second presentation is "Queers Under Siege: Update On Right Wing Homophobia Nationwide" and is scheduled for 7 p.m. in Campus Center room 917. Both presentations are free and open to the public.

A major organizer in New England

Hyde is a major player in New England's fight against anti-gay ballot initiatives. She conducts field organizing to oppose the right-wing in New England and was instrumental in the formation of two activist groups, including the Boston Area Fight The Right Network and the Boston Opposition Research Group, a gathering of people who monitor right- wing activities.

At the national level, Hyde convenes periodic gathering of gay and non-gay organizations working to defeat initiatives in 1994. Hyde's other projects for 1994 include a symposium on the international rise of the right-wing, two regional movement-building institutes, and the Fight The Right components of the annual NGLTF political conference, Creating Change.

Other states' fights

On Oct. 11 of this year, the Colorado Supreme Court threw out a discriminatory anti-gay measure passed in 1992 (Amendment 2) that would have blocked all laws protecting the civil rights of gays, lesbians and bisexuals.

Like the ballot measures about to be voted on in other states, Amendment 2 was sponsored by religious right organizations, in this case, Focus on the Family and Colorado for Family Values.

In early 1993, a Colorado judge issued an injunction against the measure pending consideration of its constitutionality. The Oct. 11 ruling by the Supreme Court held Amendment 2 in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Similar measures have been under consideration across the country. In 1992 anti-gay ballot plebiscites in Portland, Maine, and Oregon failed to pass, but in November 1993, Lewiston, Maine; Cincinnati, Ohio and Portsmouth, N.H., all voted against protecting gay people from discrimination.

If Oregon fails to pass the anti-gay referendum Nov. 8, the Oregon Citizens Alliance have two more ready for 1996. Meanwhile, Maine, Florida, Washington and Arizona may face similar initiatives.

Lack of funding is a handicap

According to The Washington Blade, a queer newspaper out of Washington, D.C., national far-right organizations, backed by conservatives foundations, have a combined annual budget of over $200 million.

The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, Human Rights Campaign Fund and the Gay and Lesbian Victory Fund have a total of less than $10 million to spend each year.

Despite this, NGLTF's Fight The Right Project and other campaigns have been working hard over the past few months to make sure that discriminatory measures sponsored by the religious right never make their way into law.

Locally, the UMass Program for GLB Concerns has been operating a raffle to raise money for groups battling initiatives in the Pacific Northwest. Raffle winners will be announced during Hyde's noon presentation in the Campus Center.

Police Log

Compiled by Kelly Spang from University reports

•Indecent Assault and Battery

Oct. 21

Officials are investigating an alleged indecent assault and battery which was reported to have taken place in a Sylvan area. The alleged victim is not a University student.

•Burglary/Breaking and Entering

Oct. 21

James Marshall, 19, of 34 Nestor Ave. in Fitchburg was arrested for breaking and entering in the night time, intent to commit a misdemeanor, two counts of assault, disorderly person, and throwing glass onto a public way.

•Accident/Property Damage

Oct. 20

A vehicle operated by Maureen Smith of Northampton Road had stopped for a pedestrian in the crosswalk on University Drive. Her vehicle was struck from behind by another vehicle operated by Jason Raboin of Fitchburg. Raboin was cited for speed greater than reasonable due to weather conditions.

•Suspicious Activity

Oct. 22

Chris Diamantopoulos, 19, of 68 South Main St. in South Ashburnham was arrested on Massachusetts Avenue for indecent exposure.

Casey Carpenter, 21, of 95 Round Hill Road in Northampton was arrested on Massachusetts Avenue for indecent exposure.

•Vandalism

Oct. 21

An individual reported three motorcycles at the top of the Southwest Horseshoe were tipped over and damaged.

Staff reported derogatory racial graffiti written on a wall near the elevator of the 22nd floor in the W.E.B. DuBois Library.

An individual who had parked his motorcycle on the north side of Baker Residence Hall discovered it had been moved a distance and tipped over, causing damages estimated to be $400.

An individual who sat on a water fountain in the concourse level has agreed to pay restitution for the damage which was caused, valuing about $100.

•Larceny

Oct. 20

An individual reported his wallet was stolen from his locker in Boyden Gym.

Oct. 21

An individual reported that he returned to his locker in Boyden Gym and found that the lock had been removed and his wallet stolen.

Oct. 22

An individual reported his wallet with $75 was stolen from his locker along with clothing from Boyden Gym. The wallet minus the money was later found and turned into the UMass police.

•Liquor Law Violations

Oct. 21

William Kelly, 19, 334 Washington St. in Arlington was arrested on Sunset Avenue for a minor transporting alcoholic beverages.

Leanne Chandler, 19, of 3 Fairway Drive in Canton was arrested on Fearing Street for a minor transporting alcoholic beverages.

Michael Ligenza, 19, of 447 Southwick St. in Feeding Hills was arrested on Stadium Drive for a minor transporting and operating a motor vehicle while drinking alcohol.

Robin Rheaume, 18, 557 Elm St. in South Dartmouth was arrested on University Drive for a minor transporting alcoholic beverages.

Oct. 22

Andrew Robertson, 18, 24 Chandler Ave. in Longmeadow was arrested on University Drive for a minor transporting alcoholic beverages.

Benjamin Schlatka, 18, of 18 Simon Atherton Road in Harvard was arrested was arrested on University Drive for a minor carrying an alcoholic beverages, using a false motor vehicle document and delivering alcoholic beverages to a minor.

Matthew Cooper, 19, of 39 Crestwood Lane in Marlborough was arrested on Massachusetts Avenue for a minor transporting alcoholic beverages in a motor vehicle, minor carrying alcoholic beverages and illegal possession of a class D substance.

Jamie Herlihy, 19, of 12 Paddock Lane in Medway was arrested for a minor carrying alcoholic beverages and illegal possession of a class D substance.

•Annoying Behavior

Oct. 21

An individual from Cance Residence Hall reported a former acquaintance threatened her boyfriend. The incident is under investigation.

•Fire Alarm

Oct. 20

A pull station was activated in Van Meter Residence Hall, resulting in the evacuation of the building.

•Motor Vehicle Stops

Oct. 22

Eric Michael Bancroft, 22, of 58 Russell St. in Hadley was stopped on Massachusetts Avenue for failure to stop for a police officer while operating a motor vehicle, operating after suspended license which was his second offense, operating a motor vehicle without a current inspection sticker, and operating a motor vehicle without a license.

Domingo Carrion, 19, of 7 Caldwell Place in Springfield was stopped on North Pleasant Street for a minor transporting alcoholic beverages, operating a motor vehicle without a license, attaching plates to a motor vehicle, speeding and operating an unregistered motor vehicle in the form of a trailer.

Oct. 23

New techniques make for better sap

UMass professor doing research with maple syrup production

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

If maple syrup is tasting better than ever, it may be due to the efforts of a University of Massachusetts professor who is working to improve the quality of syrup.

Thomas Potter, director of the Mass Spectrometry Facility in the department of food science, wants to help syrup producers better process their sap and thereby make a better maple syrup.

Using advanced organic chemical techniques, Potter has identified many of the chemical compounds that contribute to the flavor and aroma of maple syrup.

"Our whole mission is to simply try to help syrup producers produce a higher quality and more valued product," Potter said.

According to Potter, if a way of processing these untouched chemical compounds which contribute to the flavor of maple syrup can be designed, it would help maple syrup producers make a product of much higher quality.

"We are now trying to determine what mechanisms are involved in the conversion process, so that we can ultimately advise syrup producers about how to best optimize the flavor quality of their products," Potter said.

Potter's research is funded by the University's Agricultural Experiment station. It is also funded by the North American Maple Syrup Council's Research Grant Program.

Potter presented the results of his research at the annual meeting of the North American Maple Syrup Council and the International Maple Syrup Institute in West Springfield last week.

Bill Coli, a cooperative extension specialist in the department of entomology at UMass, also participated in the meeting.

Coli has conducted research funded by the Syrup Council on designing a monitoring trap for pear thrips, a pest which causes damage to the leaves of the sugar maple tree.

Potter said the meeting was a success.

According to Potter, several hundred people showed up at the conference.

He said ideas were exchanged, and the Council has provided more funds.

"Maple syrup is a $40-50 million business," Potter said.

"It's an agricultural commodity that's much more product oriented."

VIBES brings trickers and treaters to campus

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

About 100 underprivileged children will be storming Chadbourne and Greenough residential halls tonight for the fifth annual Halloween trick-or-treat program.

According to Melissa Piskosz, senior and co-coordinator of Volunteer Initiatives Lending Education and Services (VIBES), the trick-or-treat program is headed by the School of Management volunteers, and designed to help kids 12 and under have something to do for Halloween.

"They come from shelters in Amherst, Holyoke and Northampton," Piskosz said. "We provide transportation from the PVTA."

VIBES volunteers are expecting about 80 children to participate in the event from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m.

There will be a party for the kids in Greenough basement following the event.

"We ask them not to bring children over 12," Piskosz said. "If they do, we won't turn them away, we just think the older kids will get bored."

Piskosz said VIBES has money in their budget for the project, but they also get donations from major supermarkets and small businesses.

"[Supermarkets] give us gift certificates," Piskosz said. "We use them to buy candy."

VIBES will be supplying the candy and decorations. Residents in the halls are asked to participate by handing out candy when the children come to their door — dressing up is optional.

"The response has been great," said Lee Dagle, assistant residence director for Baker, Chadbourne and Greenough. "Students in Baker actually complained that we're not using their hall."

"Last year we did it in Southwest, and the residents were really excited," Piskosz said.

Melissa Walters, a resident assistant in Baker, said she was a resident assistant in Southwest during last year's event, and the students were cooperative.

"We had to decorate the halls," Walters said. "So we gave a pizza party to the best hall. It got more students involved."

Walter's said she requested it to be hosted in Central after moving from Southwest.

"We couldn't use Baker because it was too big," Walters said. "For security reasons, we didn't want to lose the kids. In Chadbourne and Greenough everything is smaller."

According to Walters, the students in Baker who want to participate can decorate the lobbies of Chadbourne and Greenough.

Walters said a lot of the students who are involved are education majors who miss being around children.

According to Dagle, of the 164 rooms total in Chadbourne and Greenough, 100 to 130 rooms will be participating.

"We talk to the R.A.s once we've connected with VIBES," Dagle said. "Then the R.A.s tell the residents. It's basically word of mouth."

VIBES sponsors other events for the community, including a holiday party were they give presents to children.

Israel security prepares for Pres. Clinton's visit

By Dan Perry
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel has rounded up dozens of Islamic militants, including two believed to be accomplices in the deadly Tel Aviv bus bombing, amid fears of terror attacks during President Clinton's visit.

Clinton is to join 5,000 guests at Wednesday's gala signing of the Israel-Jordan peace treaty at a desert border crossing just north of the Red Sea. He plans to tour Jerusalem the next day. Fearing that militant fundamentalists may try to disrupt the visit, Israel is mounting a massive security effort.

Hamas, the militant group that stunned Israel with the bus bombing and two other terrorist attacks in the past two weeks, warned Monday it would strike again if its leaders were harmed. Twenty-three people, including the bomber, were killed in Wednesday's bus attack.

In Washington, Secretary of State Warren Christopher called for an international ban on public and private financing for Hamas, Hezbollah and other extremist groups.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin survived a no-confidence motion Monday in parliament by hawkish parties who blame his peace policies for the increasingly bold terrorist attacks. Legislators rejected the motion 56-50 with one abstention.

"The enemy smells your weakness and won't stop striking at us," said Ariel Sharon, a right-wing former defense minister. "He understands only . . . Jewish might."

Pro-government speakers accused the opposition of making political capital from the bloodshed. Religious legislator Shlomo Benizri urged Muslim religious leaders to condemn Hamas, calling it "a disgrace to Arabs."

Israel army radio said intelligence officials had received warnings that Hamas planned a large-scale attack, and a senior police official said security forces were on alert.

The official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said 6,000 police officers would protect Clinton, and 100 Secret Service agents were in Israel to coordinate details.

American security officials unsuccessfully lobbied Clinton to cancel part of the Jerusalem trip, he said Monday.

"There is no specific word that Hamas intends to carry out an attack during the visit, but it would certainly be an important and spectacular target for them," the official told The Associated Press.

He said the main fear was that "while all eyes are elsewhere, on Jerusalem and on the signing, they will stage large-scale attacks like car bombs in other cities like Tel Aviv or Haifa." Other militants, including right-wing Jewish extremists, were also considered possible security threats, the official said.

Muslim militants in the PLO-ruled Gaza Strip said there were no plans to spoil the Clinton visit for fear of provoking the Americans.

"But the atmosphere is burning, and things are not fully predictable," said Sheik Abdallah Shami, a leader of the Islamic Jihad fundamentalist group.

Since the Tel Aviv bombing, Israeli troops have arrested dozens of Hamas members, security officials confirmed. Rabin said those arrested included two accomplices in the Tel Aviv bombing, but he gave no details.

A police source said the two were the suicide bomber's brother and cousin.

Clinton takes credit for deficit fall

WASHINGTON — The U.S. budget deficit fell to $205 billion in the just-completed fiscal year, the Clinton administration announced Monday, crediting "very disciplined" Democratic management for achieving the largest two-year deficit reduction in history.

"The bottom line is getting stronger every day," a jubilant Clinton said in a speech to business leaders in Cleveland. "For the first time in 20 years, the deficit has gone down two years in a row."

While President Clinton and his economic team sought to capitalize on the accomplishment, Republicans were brandishing a secret White House memo they claimed laid bare the administration's fiscal hypocrisy.

They charged that the Oct. 3 memo by White House budget director Alice Rivlin exposed an agenda for higher taxes and cuts in popular government benefit programs to cope with rising deficits in future years.

With two weeks to go before the election, both sides sought to portray the budget debate to their advantage.

The administration claimed that its willingness to enact a $500 billion deficit reduction program last year was paying benefits in an improving economy and shrinking deficit after 12 years of failed Republican promises.

Clinton noted that before his deficit program was approved, the imbalance for the 1994 budget year had been projected to hit $305 billion.

Clinton faces down GOP accuser

CLEVELAND — Buoyed by a dose of good economic news, President Clinton faced down a Republican lawmaker who showed up at a campaign stop to chastise the president for using "inflammatory" language against the GOP.

Clinton, capping a three-day swing for Democratic candidates, announced a significant drop in the federal deficit. And he asserted it will skyrocket again if Republicans gain control of Congress and push their agenda of "easy promises and quick fixes."

He took questions afterward from a generally supportive crowd at the City Club of Cleveland. The audience, which was told not to make speeches, held a lottery to determine who would ask Clinton questions. By luck of the draw, club member Rep. Martin Hoke, R-Ohio, was one of the winners.

He took the opportunity to criticize Clinton for constantly calling the "Contract with America," a list of GOP campaign promises, a "Contract on America."

"Your advisers may think that this is cute rhetoric, but I think it's outrageous," Hoke said, before being drowned out by audience members demanding that he get to the point.

Allegations dismissed against Kennedy

WASHINGTON — The Senate ethics committee has dismissed allegations of sexual harassment and drug use by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

The committee, which never announced it had begun a low-level inquiry, wrote a statement Oct. 13 that it had ended the effort — but did not distribute the announcement at that time. After several inquiries from reporters, the statement was released generally on Monday.

The allegations against the Massachusetts Democrat were made by former Kennedy staffer Richard Burke in a 1992 book about the senator.

"The committee interviewed Mr. Burke and others and found no basis for Mr. Burke's allegations," the committee said. "On that basis, the committee in June 1994 unanimously voted to take no further action."

The committee also stated that, contrary to statements by Burke, "the committee did not receive complaints by women who claimed to have been sexually harassed by Sen. Kennedy."

The committee never began a formal investigation of the allegations, an action that is publicly announced. The statement was written by the committee's chairman, Sen. Richard Bryan, D-Nev., and vice chairman, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., in response to media inquiries.

Kennedy is locked in a tough re-election battle with Republican Mitt Romney.

Bosnian soldiers attack U.N. peacekeepers

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Bosnian government soldiers attacked U.N. peacekeepers with machine guns, grenades and remote-controlled mines on Monday, provoking a furious response from the U.N. commander.

No casualties were reported, but the attacks on Mount Igman, overlooking Sarajevo, worsened the U.N. force's already strained relations with the Muslim-led government.

After a harsh protest from Lt. Gen. Sir Michael Rose, the peacekeeping commander for Bosnia, Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic said he would order his troops to "desist from this sort of firing," a U.N. spokesman said.

Rose called the attacks "exceptionally dangerous and potentially catastrophic," said the spokesman, Lt. Col. Tim Spicer.

The attacks occurred as Bosnian troops reluctantly began withdrawing Monday afternoon from a U.N.-patrolled demilitarized zone.

Smoking restrictions may cost restaurants

WASHINGTON — Restaurant patrons who can't light up while sipping after-dinner coffee will stay home and hold back billions of dollars, restaurant owners said Monday.

"Home cooking is still our major competition," Los Angeles restaurateur Biff Naylor said in an interview before testifying at a Labor Department hearing. "Those people will go home." But Labor Department officials said the restaurant industry was overreacting to proposed regulations that would virtually ban smoking in 6 million places where people work, including restaurants and bars.

"In communities where there have been restrictions, the industry, in fact, does quite well," said Mike Silverstein, director of policy for the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

OSHA, a division of the Labor Department, resumed protracted hearings Monday on its proposed indoor air quality standards. New rules would affect a number of issues related to the quality of the air workers breathe at their job sites.

Mednick's office is handling Carroll's case.

The official report of the cause of death will not be available for six weeks.

The spleen could have been bleeding for a while and the loss of blood could have made him weak and drowsy, Mednick said.

Searching for the good old days

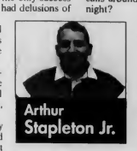
Senior year of college is supposed to be fun, isn't it? Your last two semesters before stepping out into the real world to search for a job, find a life-long mate, raise a family.

Heading into this semester, I had high hopes for uptown, for my job, for my friends . . . the only success I've had so far is in my classes. Maybe I had delusions of grandeur.

I've undergone a complete role reversal — from the happy-go-lucky guy I was last year, to the serious, moody one I've been up until now.

Something, or rather someone, is missing from my junior year here at the University. Graduation is a time for all students to say goodbye. People change, yet your friendships last a lifetime.

I thought I was going to spend my senior year with everyone who allowed me to laugh, cry and get pissed off all at the same time, without too much of a change from last year.



Arthur Stapleton Jr.

It was to be the best year of my life, and I would not have wished to spend it with anybody else. I guess you could say the whole is greater than the sum of its parts.

And that group of individual parts who partied every night together last year was kept together by one person.

He's now in Indiana and the group I hang out with hasn't been the same.

Job offers come one week, one month, one year after graduation, and you have to be flexible enough to jump at the chance and fly by the seat of your pants.

My roommate from last year did just that and he's living, along with his dog, in Indiana. His new friends are two times his age and he works more than he sleeps. It's hard to leave home, pack all your things in a suitcase, and take a job halfway across the country.

With the lack of job openings a graduating senior must act first and think second, leaving everything behind. What one leaves behind are groups of people here in Amherst who often followed by example.

All groups of friends have leaders, ranging from those who decide what parties to frequent on the weekends, to as simple as to the person with the car.

Who arranges the road trips? Who makes the phone calls around campus to find out what is going on Friday night?

These may sound like trivial things, but on a college campus, they could be the difference between having a great time uptown or sitting home and playing Sega.

No matter what some people say, group dynamics change every semester. Students move on to bigger and better things with graduation, academics have more of an effect on some than others, and some plainly drop out of school.

When one becomes comfortable within cliques, small or large, it is too easy to stay put and not branch out.

You end up doing everything with your group — you go to the same bars, you take up the same habits, you begin to date people within the group . . . consequently, friends from years past go by the boards and you don't keep your options open.

Then, something weird happens — that clique you were so comfortable in last year suddenly falls apart because the person who kept it together is not around.

The leader is gone and others are asked to fill the role. If someone doesn't, those individual parts still socialize, but the everyday interaction isn't there. It happens frequently — it happened to my group.

And then you are alone, sitting home, playing Sega, and wondering where all of the fun at ZooMass has gone.

Maybe if I stopped worrying about not having fun and started to enjoy myself, I'd realize that the good times are there — we just have to find them, whether it is alone or with others following by example.

Facing the ignorant hemp ban

Imagine a natural resource that can be grown as a crop in the United States, that can make fabric, treat disease, serve as food and fuel, and even be converted into an environmentally sound plastic. You don't have to imagine; it exists. It is called hemp.

Cannabis sativa (literally, "useful hemp") is the most durable hemp plant. This cannabis' pulp can make paper without the chemicals needed to make wood-pulp paper. And with less than 4 percent of our old-growth forests remaining, it is reassuring to know that hemp grows back faster than trees.

Hemp can be burned as fuel, or converted into charcoal, methanol, methane and even gasoline. Burning hemp does not lend to the greenhouse effect. Other fuels do.

Hemp fiber makes a strong cloth — so strong that the first Levi's blue jeans were hemp.

It requires little fertilizer, and repels pests on its own, without pesticides. Cotton, on the other hand, is responsible for about 50 percent of all U.S. pesticide use. And hemp's deep roots are good for the soil.

Hemp seeds make a high-protein gruel that is similar to oatmeal. It won't get you high, but it will digest easily.

Hemp proteins are closer to natural human blood proteins than are most. Hemp can be processed into plastics, and into flexible construction materials.

Cannabis is medicinal as well. It is cheaper, safer and more effective than many current prescription medications.

Tobacco has killed millions. Tobacco companies must addict three million minors each year just to break even.

Peter J. Orvetti

Hemp can be used to treat multiple sclerosis, cancer, glaucoma, depression, epilepsy, migraine, asthma and another major illness:

"I have AIDS. Marijuana is helping me. Why do I have to go to the street and risk my safety for a medicine that is improving my quality of life?"

"I'm using marijuana to keep my weight and stop nausea. I want to live. I love my children."

Both statements are from people with AIDS, who are being denied a useful treatment. Another AIDS patient asked, "Why won't they believe us?"

Strangely enough, everything I've said that hemp can do is technically legal in the United States, except the most important: medicinal use. This is because hemp is legal, only marijuana is illegal.

"Marijuana" is a Mexican slang term for the medicinal and recreational drug that comes from the hemp plant.

The term was co-opted by American anti-drug forces back in the days of "Reefer Madness." It refers only to the flowers, buds and leaves of the cannabis plant. Hemp is perfectly legal in the United States, but you cannot grow hemp without automatically coming into possession of marijuana.

The reasons why big business — plastics, oil, pharmaceuticals — would want hemp out of the way are obvious. Marijuana provided the excuse.

By corporate decree and several accidents of history, marijuana was criminalized. By virtue of that criminalization, hemp was essentially banned in the United States.

Today the hemp movement is growing in strength. With two far more dangerous drugs, alcohol and tobacco, legal and thriving — the latter with heavy government sponsorship — hemp's time has come. Marijuana's time, too.

Tobacco has killed millions. Tobacco companies must addict three million minors each year just to break even.

Marijuana, with medicinal and psychological uses, as well as potential therapeutic use in assisting crack addicts to come clean, has never killed anyone.

But like general drug decriminalization, the hemp movement has strong opposition from Washington, Wall Street and the crime world.

National hemp advocates, like those who will demonstrate down the road at Hampshire College on Saturday, are written off as potheads in the corporate-owned media.

Hemp remains banned because of ignorance. Where did this ignorance come from?

Letters to the Editor

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please TYPE your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

The Editorial/Opinion page will occasionally print guest columns, but arrangements must be made in advance. If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, UMass.

Appreciating the wisdom of elders

Chris Taylor Conner

I was lucky to have Coach Hines and Pops.

From 5th through 12th grade, my middle school history teacher, Mr. Hines, was my track coach. This, of course, meant that any academic slip of mine or my teammates would, without fail, fall upon his ears.

And these were by no means deaf ears.

In the small private boys' school from which I graduated, the collective GPA's of the sports teams were kept on record. Coaches and student-athletes alike took pride in their achievements both on and off the field; Coach Hines and my fellow runners were no exception.

The track team would always seem to place just behind crew, a source of irritation each year. We weren't annoyed because we were a bunch of geeks, but because we couldn't stand to lose at any game; we were that competitive.

I credit Coach Hines for keeping much of that spirit alive.

For Black athletes at the school (the few, the proud), there was one special person who kept us in check, stayed on our backs continually, gave us the extra push. He had been a teacher and coach in the Philadelphia public school system, and, upon retirement, came to teach lower and middle school P.E.; he also was an assistant coach for several teams, one of those being track.

We called him "Pops."

And we were afraid.

Pops was the type of guy who would know your test grade before you put the pen down.

He would look you in the eye and make you tremble knowing that you hadn't done your homework.

He would sneak up on you at will, wring your ear like a sopping wet dishrag, and make you promise to shut up in class.

He always knew something. About every brother.

And we were afraid.

Pops was a positive Black role model in a predominantly White college prep school. We weren't really afraid of him, we were afraid to disappoint him. Everyone I knew (not a great deal of people in an upper school of about 160 students) respected him, especially the small group of Black student-athletes. By making us constantly peer over our shoulders, he reciprocated that respect in his own inimitable style.

The intimidation style, that is.

As I enter my first year as a Black student-athlete at UMass, I can't help but to wonder if there will be another Coach Hines or Pops. We're all supposed to be big boys and girls now, but once again I find myself as one of the few, the proud — in a substantially bigger place.

Looking to the men's basketball team and their academic predicament, I wonder if they have that base of support or if some players have ever had it.

I was lucky to have Coach Hines and Pops.

Alum disgusted with hoop program

To the editor:

The administration's decision to allow four UMass basketball players to remain in school disgusts me. As a former student who has followed the UMass basketball program since 1989, I attended just about every home game, some away games, and spent many nights watching them on TV. When UMass won, I would jump for joy and feel so proud that this was my school team. The tremendous improvement John Calipari has made since his induction impressed me. Until now.

Although their cums fell below 2.0, I personally know two people who received higher GPAs for two concurrent semesters than those involved on the basketball team. They were academically dismissed. You may argue all you want how the basketball players generate revenue for the University. However, my acquaintances generated revenue for the University and did not need a scholarship. At a time when UMass has relaxed its admission requirements, this is not the time to allow basketball players who cannot pass physical education 101 to remain in school. Other, less fortunate intellects could benefit from their scholarships and it defaces the value of everyone's diploma.

Student supports Roosevelt

To the editor:

In April of 1992, while covering an event for the Collegian, I had the pleasure of meeting Mark Roosevelt, now the democratic candidate for governor. Recently, I've heard many people say that they don't know much about the governor's race, except for the $1 million in negative ads that Weld has been running about Roosevelt.

Roosevelt is the only state-wide candidate to come to UMass. He came here because we are part of his conviction that success boils down to two things: education and jobs. Last year, when UMass asked the state for a $21 million increase, Weld offered $4 million for the entire five campus system. This was really a cut since it was less than the rate of inflation. Weld told us that he wants to make UMass into "Harvard with a subsidy" (God, I hope not!). Roosevelt was one of the state reps who supported the increase that we eventually got, $15 million ($7 million of which came to the Amherst campus to provide the refunds we've been getting).

Roosevelt knows that tuition and fees, like taxes, are high enough.

On Nov. 8, I'm saying no to the status quo. Because we can do better, I'm voting for Mark Roosevelt. He cares.

Arts Council thanks reporters

To the editor:

Last Wednesday at 8:36 a.m., during rush hour in Tel- Aviv, on a street lined with Tower Records, McDonald's, Pizza Hut and Ben & Jerry's, a bomb went off on a bus killing 21 people and injuring 48 others. 18 people still remained hospitalized. Hamas took responsibility for this act of terrorism.

Hamas is an independent group based in the Gaza Strip with around 20 percent of the Palestinian support. They have said that they are unalterably opposed to the existence of the Jewish state, and its aim is to replace Israel with a strict Islamic state. They also stated "by command of the Prophet, Muslims must fight the Jews and kill them wherever they are."

Two weeks ago they took hostage an Israeli soldier, 19 year old Nachmon Waxman, who also carried American citizenship, and held a gun to his head on worldwide television, saying they would kill him if 200 Hamas terrorists were not released. When Israel attempted to save Nachmon, three members of Hamas were killed. Nachmon also died.

What is going on here? What is Hamas trying to accomplish? Israel is criticized over and over again for "disregarding human rights." One of the main issues supporting this is the Hebron Massacre, which took place March 25, 1994. Here one crazed Israeli settler fatally shot 29 Palestinians. This, however, was the act of a lone man who had NO affiliation or group backing him up. Almost every Jewish group from the Israeli government to the Hillel on the UMass campus has condemned that tragedy. So why is everyone so silent here now? Why was almost nothing mentioned in any campus newspaper and why have barely no campus voices been spoken against the people who murdered and critically injured innocent people last Wednesday.

We think that the Hamas military wing, Izzedine al- Qazzam Brigadeis, is a violent terrorist organization opposed to any reconciliation with the Jewish State, and will not think twice about killing a Jew to achieve their goals of wrecking the current Middle East peace process. All this bloodshed is getting us and them nowhere and it must stop NOW.

We would like to thank the Collegian and reporters Tara Connelly and Heather Redfern for the great coverage and journalistic eloquence regarding our MAZE artEventive and "A Look Inside the Arts Council." [Oct. 20]

We need to further clarify; however, the direct connection between the Arts Council and the Fine Arts Center.

The UMass Arts Council has always been and remains a department of the Fine Arts Center though we are not physically located in the Fine Arts Center building. We are but one of the many outreach divisions of the Fine Arts Center that exemplifies its scope and breadth of effectiveness across campus.

The Arts Council derives its support from a portion of the Fine Arts Center's student art fee which, in turn, is distributed back to the students through grants, arts information services, and public art programs that promote awareness to the diversity and universality of the arts at the University. We align our mission goals to complement and coincide with the other departments embraced by the Fine Arts Center.

Anatomy of a local band: Trying to make it big in the Valley

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the first in a two-part series focusing on the local band scene.

Before the multi-platinum records, before the huge coast- to-coast arena tours and way before the greatest hits reissues, every musical hopeful across the land proudly (and sometimes tiresomely) holds the moniker of "a local band."

As with most areas that play home to a large mass of college students (i.e. Chapel Hill, N.C.; Athens, Ga.), the Valley is a virtual breeding ground for local talent ranging from a variety of sounds, styles and attitudes.

Always working hard, and unfortunately often unappreciated, many of these bands perform an amazing juggling act between being a student, working a day job and trying to play shows and record songs. Hey, even Eddie Vedder was a security guard once.

After "grunge" became a household word and Seattle became a holdover for long-haired guys with guitars and lousy childhoods, many critics were crawling all over each other desperately looking for "the next big scene." It was soon after Billboard magazine (the bible of all that is music) ran a somewhat flattering article on the area, calling it the next musical hotbed.

While the article did indeed manage to stir up a bit of excitement as well as raise some hopes, nothing ever really seemed to pan out. So why not? The area has all the makings of a huge music scene: bars, clubs, plenty of bands, a huge number of college kids just waiting to be an audience . . . and a budding record label to boot.

With all these elements adding up, things may change relatively quickly. Already the area seems to be coming into its own, due less in part from the hype (which has already pretty much died) than to just old fashioned hard work and talent. Amherst and Northampton may not have the large pool of resources (more bands, more clubs etc.) as some of the bigger cities which crank out "the next big thing" like a machine, but the relative smallness of the area may actually work in the scene's favor.

"We are not a city, we are a smaller town where you can support a better scene," said Mal Thursday, proprietor of The Bay State Cabaret in Northampton and the founder of Chunk Records, the area's first established record label.

Thursday has been a leading force in trying to get Northampton on the map. His label, which is being distributed across the country, has been giving wider exposure to the many of the area bands, helping them get their foot in the door.

Originally started in order to put out Thursday's own material and other obscure stuff, the label found a larger home in 1992 when Thursday got the idea to start putting out records for local artists.

"I was beginning to see a lack of labels in the area. I thought it would be a good idea to start my own. I sold out of my first single," Thursday said.

After putting out a few more singles, Thursday compiled the Hotel Massachusetts compilation, a (somewhat) definitive representation of the Valley scene. From the spiraling pop of Tizzy to the lumbering rock of Zeke Fiddler, it was clear that the area had quite a range of sounds and talent.

"The area has a great scene thanks to the Bay State," said Stephen Desaulniers, bassist for The Scud Mountain Boys. "More bands have been starting up, and the scene has been small but supportive."

Starting out as an electric-based band under the moniker The Scuds, the band eventually felt as though they were burnt out. Changing their name to The Scud Mountain Boys, the band parred down to a three-piece and headed in a more country-ish direction.

Tizzy is just one of the local bands trying to make it in the Valley.

"We like to describe ourselves as suicidally slow country- pop," Desaulniers said. "I really can't think of another band that sounds like us."

The band has already released a tape entitled Pine Box (which was recorded in their kitchen), and have plans to release an album on Chunk Records entitled Dance The Night Away, in the near future.

While it is somewhat cost-consuming for local bands to record and put out their own material, The Scud Mountain Boys are not alone. Many of the area bands are finding out that the "Do It Yourself" ethic may be the only way to get their songs out to the public.

"We're recording next weekend for Chunk Records," said Jen Gallahorn, lead singer for local pop band Tizzy. While most bands either already have, or are currently in the process of doing their own recording, Tizzy may have already taken the next logical step on the music-biz ladder. They have already recorded with Dave Auchenbach of Small Factory (who have their major label debut coming out soon on Vernon Yard Records), and have a song slated for the upcoming SpinArt Records Compilation. And while the band hasn't been around for that long, they have already become a staple on the Northampton scene.

"I think the area has been really supportive," Gallahorn said. "But the problem is that there isn't a lot of places to play. There has to be more clubs."

And while there is already a handful of places for unestablished acts to play such as the aforementioned Bay State Cabaret ("Mal has done incredible things for the local scene," mused Gallahorn) and The Northampton Brewery, there is indeed a growing sentiment among bands that there is a definite lack of venues. This combined with the obvious desire for more exposure, is sending many bands looking for a greater radius in which to play.

"If you play more than once a month around here it becomes overkill anyway," said Ray Neades, guitarist and lead singer for the band Miss Reed.

Neades and his bandmates have already traveled to, and played shows in such places as New York, Boston and Cape Cod. Having to change their name from L-Dopa (some other band all ready had dibs), Miss Reed have existed in their currant incarnation for about a year playing their exuberant brand of power pop. Though he does feel the need to play out of the area more, Neades said the scene in the Valley is an excellent one.

"When the Loud Music Festival came through I thought that the local bands definitely stood up against the bigger bands that came to play," Neades said. "I feel we have a good, supportive scene."

With all these aspects of the Valley music scene intact, it seems as if it won't be long before the area gets the recognition that it deserves. Chunk Records has already put out singles in wide release and the label's Silver Jews/New Radiant Storm King single is selling quite well — giving the label, as well as the area just the kind of national attention it needs.

Tomorrow, I'll take a look at various bands, from newer acts to area mainstays, as well as spotlighting bands who take a different route to success.

Whodunit? Who cares in humorless Radioland Murders

By Daniel Pellegrini
Collegian Staff

RADIOLAND MURDERS
Directed by Mel Smith
With Mary Stuart Masterson, Brian Benben
Michael Lerner & Ned Beatty

A long time ago in a galaxy far, far away the term "Lucasfilm" stood for cinematic greatness. It meant that you were about to be absorbed by the nostalgic innocence of your most fantastical childhood memories. The big ones, Star Wars, Raiders of The Lost Ark and all of their spawnings were all derived from the psyche of one man's longing for the simple joy of being young. That man is George Lucas. A man with the scope and power to shape millions of childhoods with a film like Star Wars.

The Lucas machine, however, is sadly slowing down. Radioland Murders is the most recent "Lucasfilm" production to hit the big screen. Packed in by a cast primarily of ex-television stars, Radioland is a moderately cute little night-in-the-life excerpt of station WBN, a relatively new division of the relatively new medium.

The show is being broadcast in front of a live studio audience, and it's nothing but chaos and mayhem behind the scenes as station manager Penny (Mary Stuart Masterson) and her terminally neurotic husband and head scriptwriter Roger (Brian Benben) try to keep their goofball cast in order.

Adding to the studio's normal plethora of problems like messing up cues and pumping out last minute scripts is this alien, Satan-like voice that randomly seizes control of the airwaves and sends these weird, enigmatic messages throughout the entire auditorium. At first no one seems to give a damn, but when the WBN band's trumpet player, a big moon-faced drunk called "Ruffles" drops dead in the middle of a number and things get a tad more drastic.

It takes a couple more deaths before the police arrive, headed by Michael Lerner as the cigar-puffing detective. For some reason or another they make Roger (Benben) a prime suspect, and for the rest of the film Roger frantically Sherlocks through the studio and cast in order to clear his name and find the source of the unknown "voice" that is foretelling the murders.

It's this regulated story, which looks as if the makers of the board game Clue, were somehow involved with the project, that keeps the movie from taking off. It's like watching an off-beat one-dimensional theatrical farce that relies on its wide range of cast members to keep it afloat. (The most absurd of the cast is a cameo by the one and only Joey Lawrence, as teen heartthrob singer, who looks like one of the Everly Brothers under a severe case of "Saved By The Bell"-itis.)

Radioland isn't necessarily a bad movie — it's just not Lucas enough. It's brought to you by the same producer-writer team that made Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom, and the result comes off like a prolonged version of Doom's opening scene — only to a lesser effect. The action is keystone, the dialogue is tongue in cheek, and everything is intercut with the big band that plays on and on.

Radioland might have been an entertainer, but the movie's sense of humor kills it. The jokes, for lack of a more elaborate expression, are not funny. The comedy gets repetitive early on, most of it coming from Benben who dreamily keeps on getting smacked in the face with swinging doors. It's like a failed attempt at slapstick and although it may seem like that kind of old-fashioned humor would be compatible with an old-fashioned type film, it just doesn't cut it.

That is being a little too rash, though. Radioland Murders does supply a decent amount of charming quirkiness that deserves to be accounted for. It's probably intended for the elementary level, if you do choose to see it take notice of the nifty colorful set pieces and the nitrous oxide scene — which is good for a few laughs (no pun intended).

As for Lucas, let's hope he returns to home base soon to crank out those other three Star Wars movies that we've been waiting so long for. May the force be with you George, always. C–

Tarantino's 'Fiction' tops weekend box office again

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Crime and violence bost out love again at the box office this weekend, with Pulp Fiction holding onto the No. 1 spot, industry sources reported.

Director Quentin Tarantino's darkly funay crime saga took in an estimated $8.08 million, followed for a second week by Sylvester Stallone and Sharon Stone's action movie, The Specialist, which earned $6.1 million.

Warren Beatty's sentimental romance Love Affair debuted in the third spot, taking in $5.7 million.

The figures are preliminary estimates for ticket sales Friday through Sunday. Final figures were due late yesterday.

is now accepting applications for its next three entering classes.
(April 1995, September 1995, January 1996)
General requirements at time of entry include:
• At least 2-3 years of undergraduate college in a health science or basic science degree program. (Inquire for a complete list of specific requirements.)
• A minimum G.P.A. of 2.5. (A more competitive G.P.A. is favored.)
• A personal interest in a career as a primary care physician.
Northwestern College of Chiropractic offers a rigorous four year professional education. Our focus on science, diagnosis, chiropractic methods, patient care and research provides our graduates with the tools they need as work as primary care physicians in the health care environment. NWCC is fully accredited by North Central Association of Colleges and Schools and the Council on Chiropractic Education.

Women of color targeted for sterilization

News Analysis
By Shyamala Ivatury and Sandra Rose

According to the 1993 United Nations Development Program reports, the world's population is estimated to be 5.6 billion and by the 21st century, may double or even triple.

"The United States and Russia are the most powerful countries in the world, but only one eighth of the world's population. African people are also one eighth of the world's population of that, one fourth is Nigerian. One half of the world's population is Asian, one half of that is Chinese. There are 22 nations in the Middle East. Most people in the world are yellow, brown, black, poor female, non-Christian and do not speak English. By the year 2000, the 20 largest cities in the world will have one thing in common — none of them will be in Europe, none in the United States." (Audre Lorde, May 29, 1989, commencement address at Oberlin College).

The majority of the women of the world are poor and working class, living in the lesser developed nations. Two- thirds of the illiterate population of the world are women. One-fifth of the world is chronically undernourished. Forty thousand children die every day in the Third World from preventable causes, such as unsafe water, lack of sanitation and lack of food (1993 UNDP report).

In September 1994, the United Nations sponsored the International Conference on Population and Development in Cairo, Egypt. The conference planners referred to the Malthusian thesis blaming the poor of the world for poverty, underdevelopment and the degradation of the environment.

Thomas Malthus, in 1798, had theorized that an unchecked population growth would geometrically outface the world's food production. Malthus' 20th century successors are reviving the same ideas. They claim that there is not enough food to eat to feed the growing numbers of people. This is despite the fact that technological advances in the agricultural industry have resulted in the surplus in food production, particularly in the West. An example is poor women in India who consume on average less than 900 calories a day (1993 UNDP report). The caloric consumption of middle/upper class women in the United States is two to three times greater.

U.N. conference organizers are rallying behind the notion of curbing population growth by forcible implementation of birth control procedures on the poor women of the world.

Overpopulation vs. overconsumption

The preamble of the 1994 Cairo Conference announced that the leaders of the world are in "general agreement" that environmental degradation is related to population growth. Malthus and his successors have not to take into account the fact that increased industrial development has lead to a leveling of population, in the United States and Europe.

Governments in the Third World (also called the South) have reiterated, since the first population conference in 1974, that industrial development and the subsequent increase standard of living is the best form of contraception.

In response, conference planners and other U.N. agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) claim that the industrialization of the South would lead severe environmental crisis.

One must note that it is the underpopulated North (term for western industrialized nations and Japan) who is greatly responsible for the degradation of the environment. Exxon Valdez, 3-mile island, nuclear testing in Micronesia, Chernobyl, the Gulf War and the subsequent burning of the oil fields, can all be tied to United States, its agencies and its allies.

Furthermore, the population of the United States consumes 25 percent of the global energy thereby, releasing excess carbon dioxide in the air which causes the greenhouse effect and acid rain (1993 UNDP report).

Commodity fetishism (overvalue of goods), over- consumption and needless waste in the industrialized North are responsible for emitting vast amounts of chloro-fluro carbons (CFCs) in the atmosphere, destroying the ozone layer, deforestation of the world, soil erosion, pollution of the seas, extinction of various species of animals, and the overall disruption of the ecological cycle.

The populations of the South are largely rural or urban poor who are struggling to provide food and adequate shelter for their families. Unequal trade and power relations between the North and the South results in the exploitation of the natural resources of the South for the over- consumption of the industrialized North.

Women's groups in the South have reiterated that the implied correlation between population growth, poverty and environmental degradation is unfounded. Case studies of both Brazil and Russia prove their point. Brazil has managed to reduce its fertility rates, due to the pressures of U.S. donor agencies in the 1980s, by implementing family planning programs. However, poverty, high unemployment and inflation remains unchanged.

Russia, on the other hand, is an example of an underpopulated nation that has had a number of environmental problems and disasters. (Information provided by Geeta Sen, Harvard University Center for Population Studies.)

Women's health and population control

A controversial aspect of this population control program is the forcible sterilization of poor women in the Third World. Such programs were first implemented on poor women and women of color in the United States. The programs were so "successful" that by 1982 an estimated, 24 percent of African American women, 35 percent of the Puerto Rican women and 42 percent of Native American women were sterilized. Contraception was legalized in Puerto Rico in 1937, one year before it was in the United States ("Exposing the Numbers Game," Sonia Correa; MS magazine, September-October 1994).

In the late 1950s, Puerto Rican nationalists uncovered what they have termed as the "genocidal campaign" of sterilization of poor Puerto Rican women. It has been estimated that by 1989, 40 percent of Puerto Rican women between the ages of 15-49 have been sterilized.

There has been an effort to link the use of Norplant and Intra-Uterine Devices (IUDs) with Medicare and the Welfare System.

Norplant is a subdermal patch consisting of six tubes that are inserted in the upper arm of women. Its implementation, use, and removal require constant medical supervision. Norplant can cause serious side effects such as diabetes, liver disorders, breast cancer and high blood pressure.

The drug was originally tested on women in the Third World without their consent or knowledge. In the United States alone, over 900 women have filed class action suits against the manufacturers of Norplant. (USA Today, July 15, 1994, pg. A14.)

In 1991, David Duke supported a bill requiring the use of Norplant by welfare mothers. It is being widely used in the mostly Latino populated San Fernando school district and the heavily African American populated Baltimore school district. (Washington Post, May 29, 1991.)

The planners of the U.N. Population Conference have proposed the use of similar procedures in most of the Third World. Health activists have complained that such means of contraception avoids important issues surrounding women's health such as HIV/AIDS, other sexually transmitted diseases(STDs), prenatal care, immunization and work related injuries.

It must be noted that the transnational pharmaceutical companies are the monopolistic suppliers of the birth control devices and drugs, the cost of which will be carried primarily by the Third World nations.

The rhetoric of "women's empowerment" and "sustainable development" that is promoted by the United Nations and many of the NGOs, provides the ideological framework for the possible violation of the human rights of women and poor people. Under the facade of women's liberation, the aid agencies seem to be working hand in hand with transnational corporations and perpetuating the hysteria of the population "bomb" while obfuscating overconsumption and greed of the minority.

ALANA Honors Society gives minorities a chance

By Hernon Rozemberg
Collegian Correspondent

The ALANA Honors Society was created with the purpose of giving recognition and respect to those students of color who otherwise may have not received this status.

The African Latin American Asian Native American — known as ALANA — Honors Society was established in UMass in 1989. Its founder, Doris Clemmons, is also the current program director.

"The Honors Society strives to encourage and provide the educational stimulus needed to foster high academic achievement," Clemmons said.

The reason for the need of pursuing academic excellence within the minority community is due to the fact that misconceptions and negative stereotypes, that American society has produced, are only maintaining the ethnic divisions clearly defined.

The Honors Society is directly involved with the University's Honors Program, and through this connection, the Dean of Students Office will be coding ALANA Honors Society members as such on their individual transcripts.

The requirements to become a member of the ALANA Honor Society are to have completed 30 credits of academic work and have at least a 3.0 grade point average. This semester there are 325 members in the Society, and 542 freshmen eligible for membership. Interested students can be accepted as pre-ALANA if one has a GPA of 2.5 or higher.

Clemmons affirms that the program remains strong within the minority community as an incentive for academic as well as moral support. The AHS is a way of "showcasing our people, they being the leaders of tomorrow," she said.

"We need mutual respect for each other [and] for different peoples' backgrounds," Clemmons said, emphasizing the importance of the recognition of the intellectual capacities of peoples of color.

The ALANA Honors Society is not just restricted to the academic world. According to Clemmons, members can also get peer counseling on a variety of non-academic issues. If necessary, students will be assigned to other counseling services for minority students available to them.

One of the latest goals of the organization is to establish the ALANA Honors Society Scholarship Fund as a way of giving minority students further opportunities to stay in school during these steadfast periods of tuition increases.

Clemmons said, although staying enrolled in the in the University is getting harder, the administration should practice a "retention of its people of color" even if this has to "include financial support."

The first meeting of the Society will be held at 5:30 pm. on Oct. 31 at the Student Union Ballroom.

Open letter to campus community

To the students of the University of Massachusetts:

Following in the impressive first steps of my colleague Chris Conner, editor of "Black Affairs," I invite the student body to read the first "Multicultural Affairs" page this semester.

Many of you might be thinking that it's a little late for the first page of multicultural affairs to come out. Whether the page is or isn't classified as "Multicultural Affairs," "Black Affairs," "Women's Affairs," "Developing Nations," "GLB Issues," or "Jewish Affairs," doesn't mean that the editors and writers of those pages are not bringing you the news which concern the myriad of communities on this campus. The actual "specialty" pages will come out biweekly, but we still cover multicultural issues of interest to you, on a daily basis.

I realize the term "multicultural" has been exhausted in this community. Everyone has their own interpretation of it, and some may argue the word has lost a lot of its meaning and significance. Yet, being the new "Multicultural Affairs" editor, I have to think about what the term means in order to provide the student reader with a general scope of what you can expect to find in this page, what it's all about.

In my opinion, its all about options (sounds better than differences). It means the freedom to believe in one God, gods or no God. It means two genders—two perspectives. It means that sexuality comes in many shapes and forms. It means there is more than one way to communicate, actually there are thousands (of languages), and so on.

"Multicultural," in short, to me is multiraces, multicolors, multireligions, multiclasses, multiethnicities, multilanguages, multicustoms and multi-interests . . .

With this page I would like to give the community the option to read something else (not necessarily different, just in another context). We want to educate the campus about other types of issues, and vice-versa. You have the freedom to agree or disagree with it, but at least you'll be informed.

And oh yeah . . . I need writers too!

Sincerely,

Michelle Lugo

Jeff Caron to transfer to UMass Dartmouth after this semester

After less than two weeks of practice, freshman walk-on guard Jeff Caron has decided to transfer and not play basketball at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

As the 16th player on the roster, (NCAA only allows 15 to travel), Caron has decided to transfer to UMass-Dartmouth following this semester according to Minuteman Assistant Coach John Robic.

"We were surprised, but we wish him the best of luck there," Robic said.

The Minutemen open their season Nov. 28 at the Tipoff Classic against defending champion Arkansas.

one tough, Steelers never score, Raiders are up-and-down, Browns look great, Lions and Bears have the same identity as the past 10 years, Bucs are in a class with Bengals, 49ers are legit as usual, and the Eagles and Cardinals are too hard to figure out.

Apologies go out to any fan of a team that didn't make this week's rolodex. Nonetheless, it's time to move on to a pressing issue here — the Tailgater of the Year Award. With no clear leader in the Heisman trophy voting thus far, and no clear leader as the Player of the Year in the NFL, the award is picking up some significance.

It seems my secretary opened up some hate mail from a former Collegian columnist, stating that if he wasn't considered for the award, he would have to take appropriate measures. Having survived the depths of a wrestling match in the steel cage early in my career, I have no fear of anyone that sends hate mail.

But can someone explain to me why the return address on the envelope read Boyden Building? If any more "Shots" are sent my way, I might have to retaliate. More on this in the upcoming weeks.

As of now, brother Doogie holds a slight edge for the award, but of course, there is plenty of time left in the season. If you heard the rumors that the race is tightening, it's true. And coming off an away game and a bye week, there should be quite a few motivated tail-gaiters in Foxboro this Sunday after the three-week hiatus from the grill.

Finally, Bill Clinton was in my hometown last week to sign an education bill at my old high school, and rumor has it he stopped by my place to chat about the Pats. Sorry I missed you prez'.

My father (you all know him as Double R) supposedly offered the prez' a seat to Sunday's game against the Dolphins, but Billy C had to decline. This only means one thing — he receives absolutely no consideration for Tailgater of the Year.

Until next time, here's to a good Sunday of football, and of course, a good Sunday of tailgating.

place game against the University of California-San Diego.

In last year's NCAA tournament, its first appearance ever in this vaunted competition, UMass became the first eastern school to defeat a western school in water polo with a 15-13 win over UC-San Diego in the consolation round. This time the Tritons got their revenge.

With seven seconds left in the fourth quarter, UC-San Diego scored to win the rematch, and left the Minutemen with a bad aftertaste. Even with the balanced scoring that included sophomore Ron Gonen's three goals, and junior John Luviano's goal and two-pointer, UMass came out on the wrong end of this tight contest.

Contrary to early nail- biting wins against Air Force and Harvard, luck seemed to run out for the Minutemen this weekend. Better now then in a few weeks.

Erin Lynch a defensive star for UMass

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

With about 22 minutes left in last Saturday's match against Connecticut, defender Erin Lynch went down with an ankle injury.

Lynch laid still for about a minute before getting up on her own power and walking off the field. As she was walking off, the sophomore looked back at teammate Rebecca Myers and motioned to her that she would be back.

Lynch was back about a minute and a half later and played through the pain. Some players would take themselves out of a game if they injured an ankle, but Lynch is not just any player.

"It's pretty swollen right now, but I couldn't come out of that game," Lynch said. "It didn't hurt that bad. Right when you sprain your ankle there's a numbness that goes along with it and then like five minutes later it's okay. But after the game it was hurting. I had to get ice and therapy on it."

"[That's] very tough," UMass Assistant Coach April Kater said about Lynch playing with the injury. "I made a comment to her at half time too, I was just like 'Hey, I have a lot of respect for you now.' Not that I didn't before, but that was big time. We needed that. And I think obviously the other players got a rise out of that."

UMass had already lost freshman defender Erica Iverson to a hamstring injury, so losing Lynch would have been even worse. Iverson is the key to UMass' defense.

"She's a great defensive player, hard to stop," sophomore midfielder Myers said of her teammate. "If she doesn't play well, it has a great impact on the team."

Coming out of Lyndon B. Johnson Academy in Austin, Texas, Lynch had a chance to play college basketball at Texas A&M where she would have had a scholarship. But since soccer was her first love, Lynch said she decided to come to UMass, and she is happy that she did.

"You have a lot of pride when your playing for UMass because everybody is usually out to beat you. If they beat you then they have a chance."

Last year as a freshman, Lynch had the privilege of playing alongside All-American Paula Wilkins.

"Playing alongside her, she was such a leader," Lynch said of Wilkins. "Just being a freshman, she told me what to do and I did it. She helped me out so much."

Lynch played in 20 games last year, starting 17 of them. She had one goal and four assists. Her one goal just happened to be the game-winner against Providence in the NCAA Northeast Regional semifinal.

This year, Lynch has become more offensive, scoring three goals while also dishing out two assists.

"My role is basically to defend when we don't have the ball," Lynch said. "But when the opportunity is there, Coach wants me to get forward, serve balls and score a couple of goals."

"She's definitely a key player, a key person to have on a team," Kater said. "She's very composed, she's plays very smart, and she's intelligent. You can tell she's a thinker out there and that's what we need especially coming out of the back."

UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

"In terms of her skills, she's just getting better and better every time I see her play. She's had a tremendous season."

Before the season, Lynch was named in Soccer News magazine, one of the top 10 sophomores in the country, along with her teammate Myers. To her, it was a big surprise.

"I really didn't know," she said. "But to know, it gives you confidence. It doesn't make me feel any better."

As for personal goals, Lynch just wants to play her best and help the team get back to the Final Four.

"[Our] team goal is to make it to the playoffs first, and then hopefully make it to the Final Four and win the National Championship."

If the Minutewomen are to make it to the Final Four again this year, they will need Lynch to continue playing like she has so far this season: outstanding.

Tomorrow UMass is hosting Vermont in its last regular season home game, at 2:30 p.m. at Richard F. Garber field.

"I don't think that they are at the level of Hartford or UConn but we can't take anyone for granted right now. If we play to our capabilities, we should come out with the win," Lynch said.

Montana proves he is still the best

Things have been tough lately. It's one of those times when it seems like nothing can go right, and then without mercy, something even worse is piled on top of the load...the Patriots don't play.

While my thoughts today sincerely rest with the Big Tuna's crew, I am forced to turn my attention to other happenings around the league. And no, I'm not happy about it either.

Before I get to this past Sunday's action, I am still drop- jawed amazed at the performance Joe Montana put on last Monday night. Running the two-minute drill with Kansas City in a desperation state, he marched the Chiefs up the field with relative ease. KC won, and Joe proved once again he is a legend. Who wants to dispute that he isn't the "best of all time"? It's hard to make a point against it.

Mike Reiss on the NFL

The Chiefs disposed of Seattle 38-23. Look at Joe go. And this brings me up to my next point of how to classify a quarterback as "the best of all time." Do you measure him by Super Bowl rings? Do you measure him by how well he performs in the clutch? More on this in the future, but keep your thoughts in mind.

Denver brought San Diego back to life this Sunday, defeating the 'Bolts 20-15. Man, this NFL season is hard to get a grip on. Also, how do you figure that the Redskins and Colts can combine for 68 points (a 41-27 Washington triumph)? Gus Frerotte wins in his debut at quarterback for Washington, something first-round do-everything QB Heath Shuler has had trouble doing. Go figure.

Dallas proves they still belongs at the top of the NFC East with back-to-back wins against divisional foes. Last week the Cowboys beat Philadelphia, while this week, they survived Arizona (28-21).

Giants continue to struggle, which can't make my neighbor Duane too happy. The New Yorker, who stole my toaster and air-popper from my room when I was in the shower, is getting what he rightfully deserves. Hey, maybe if you return the loot, the G-men will get back on track. Likely not, though. You know it as well as I do big guy, they have no QB!

If it's not bad enough having a Giants fan living next to you, what if his roommate is a Bengals fan? It's true. Poor Owen (no relation to the King of Harts). Need I make an argument against the hapless Bengals?

Now, let's go around the league, as I span the rolodex of the mind: Rams continue to play every-

West Coast trip hard on water polo

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

In a major test this last weekend at the Baldy View Tournament in Claremont, Calif., the No. 11 nationally ranked University of Massachusetts men's water polo team (24–6) took two steps forward and three steps back as they finished with a disappointing 2–3 record.

Travelling to the "hub" of collegiate water polo, with a majority of the Top 10 teams making their residence in the region, the possibility to test the team's capabilities against major competition faced them.

With this being the squad's last significant meet before the Eastern Championships this November 5–6, the Minutemen can only be left scratching their heads from this latest setback. Are they ready for the upswing in competition that comes with the post–season or not?

This past Friday, before tournament weekend, UMass had a tough warm–up match with the No. 10 nationally ranked squad from Air Force.

Encouraged by their tough fought 8–7 victory over Air Force earlier in this season at the Navy Invitational in Annapolis, and discouraged by the lack of respect they have received in a ranking just below them, the Minutemen looked forward to this game as a stepping stone to higher ground.

But what came out of the outdoor pool in Claremont this past Friday night was another hard contest between the fringe teams of the Top Ten, and this time not in the visiting squad's favor.

In the sweet evening air of southern California, the Minutemen's 22–game winning streak came to a bitter end with a 6–4 loss. Senior co–captain Javier Gonzalez led the team with three out of the four goals.

In Saturday's opening rounds of the Baldy View, UMass rebounded well from the previous night's loss and swept the day's contests. In their first match of the day, they beat Santa Clara University by a score of 14–6. UMass was led by Gonzalez with five tallies and junior Luis Limardo with three scores.

The later match versus the University of Redlands was all Limardo, as the Minutemen won once again by a closer margin of 14–9. Setting a new water polo school record for goals in a game, the 6'2", 205 pound two–meter player from Guaynabo, Puerto Rico led the way with 10 tallies.

These two wins set up UMass for Sunday's semi–final round, and a match against the No. 7 ranked team in the country, the University of California–Santa Barbara. Also, with one victory, the team would tie the school record for victories in a season held by the 1992 team that went 29–3.

Unfortunately, that was not the case. In the loss in the semi–finals to Santa Barbara, Limardo and Gonzalez carried the brunt of the scoring for the team again with three and five goals apiece, respectively.

What may have been a disappointment in not making the finals, arose as another opportunity to solidify their status in the third

Minutewomen drop two over weekend

By Derek Milosavljevic
Collegian Staff

What began with so much promise finished with more of a whimper than a bang.

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team dropped two matches over the weekend, finishing the schedule of dual matches for the fall season and leaving the Minutewomen with a record of 7–5.

The team ends the fall having lost five of its last six matches after jumping out to a 6–0 start.

On Oct. 21, UMass traveled to West Point to take on the Cadets of the U.S. Military Academy. Army handed the team its worst defeat of the season to that point, 6–1.

UMass Captain Liesl Sitton lost her first singles match of the year to Army's Kristin Argus. After Sitton won the first set in a tie–break, Argus came back to knock off the junior lefthander, 6–7(3), 6–4, 6–3.

The loss dropped Sitton, who was coming off her victory at the New England Championships the previous weekend, to 10–1 on the season.

The only singles winner for the Minutewomen on Friday was Caroline Steele. Steele, who had played at the No. 3 singles position in the team's previous matches, dropped to the No. 5 slot against Army. The Kentucky native rallied from a set down to beat Rebecca Marier, 2–6, 6–3, 6–1.

UMass Coach Judy Dixon said although the score indicates that her team was beaten soundly by Army, in reality it was much closer.

"We lost three out of four three–set matches," Dixon said. "And if we had won those, we could have beaten them."

On Saturday, the Minutewomen took on Rutgers at the Boyden courts. Fatigue from the Army trip appeared to take its toll on UMass as the Minutewomen ended the season on a sour note, falling 9–0.

Dixon said she knew going in that her team was not yet ready to beat a regional power like Rutgers.

"We're not in their class yet," she said. "We have a young team, and in two or three years time I think we will be."

Sitton lost for the second time in as many days, again picking up the first set before allowing her opponent back into the match. Roxanne Matknusky dropped Sitton's record in dual matches to 10–2 with the 4–6, 6–1, 6–2 victory.

The only other Minuteweoman to avoid a straight set defeat was Steele. Dixon continued to juggle the freshman in the lineup, playing her at the No. 4 slot against the Knights. Like Sitton, Steele captured the first set before falling in three, 5–7, 6–3, 6–3.

Rutgers dominated the Minutewomen in the doubles portion of the contest as well, winning all three matches in straight sets.

Dixon said she is not overly concerned with the way her team ended the fall season. She said the biggest thing her team needs to learn is how to close out matches.

"Even though our record is 7–5, we lost three that could have gone either way," Dixon said. "We could have been 10–2 just as easily."

The last event on the fall schedule for the Minutewomen is the Rolex Regional Championship. Sitton will represent UMass in singles, and Steele will team with her for the doubles competition at the tourney, to be held in Philadelphia from Oct. 28–31.

Men's soccer to host Crusaders

UMass looking to reverse last year's defeat today at Garber

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

For the first time in nearly a month, Garber Field will host the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team today at 3 p.m., as the Minutemen face Holy Cross.

UMass has not played on their home field since Oct. 1 and a tough Crusader team could make it anything but an enjoyable homecoming.

Last year in Worcester, Holy Cross topped the Minutemen 3–0 on a trio of second half goals. The ugly match featured 29 fouls and left UMass lacking a favorable impression of their opponent.

That is history, though, and this year's bout should be a classic. Both the Minutemen (9–5–1) and the Crusaders (9–5– 2) enter the contest with nearly identical records of the season. UMass could use a momentum building win before they face St. Bonaventure, on Friday at Garber Field, for a shot at the first Atlantic 10 regular season title in UMass history.

It is easy to get wrapped up in anticipating Friday's game with the A–10's cellar–dwellers, but the Minutemen are not overlooking the Crusaders as they prepare for the Bonnies.

"I don't believe they are (looking ahead)," said UMass Coach Sam Koch. "I think that we made it clear yesterday in training that this is a good team. They've beaten some very good teams so far. We've got our work cut out for us. I'm sure that St. Bonaventure is in the back of their minds, but I'm pretty sure they'll be ready to play."

Holy Cross enters today's match coming off of a 4–0 drubbing at the hands of Patriot League foe Lafayette. Crusader coach Elvis Comrie will not likely allow his squad, winners of only three of its last seven, to simply slide into the postseason.

"Holy Cross will play very direct. They'll play a high pressure game," Koch said. "It will not be an easy game. They run hard off the ball and they put you under a lot of pressure very quickly. They play for other team's mistakes and they're very good at creating things from them. They're a team that will sit back and wait but also put you on the line."

The Crusaders tend to play a patient game, usually waiting for a counter–attacking opportunity to arise, as opposed to forcing a play. When the opportunities do arrive, junior forward Brian Petz becomes the center of attention. Petz, who scored twice against UMass a year ago, has 12 goals this season, five of them game winners, and one assist to his credit. Petz scored both goals in the Crusader's 2–1 overtime victory against Maine last week.

Junior goalkeeper Chris Murphy will try to hold off the Minutemen squad, which has shown an offensive burst lately. Murphy's 1.54 goals against average, and impressive 9–4–2 record, will be tested severely by a UMass attack that has found a pair of spark plugs in Kevin Martin and Mike Butler. Both Martin and Butler made considerable contributions in the Minutemen's 4–2 demolition of Rhode Island on Saturday.

Both UMass and Holy Cross defeated Maine and New Hampshire while playing close contests with Hofstra. These teams have much in common, but with another solid outing from goalkeeper Mark Wolf, the Minutemen could emerge victorious from this very even matchup.

Koch expects an exciting highly contested game at Garber this afternoon between the two teams.

"It'll be interesting to watch," Koch said. "It'll be interesting to see how we break the pressure and how we move the ball against them."

Your Horoscope
By Joane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Business matters progress nicely now. A difference of opinion could lead to an important change of attitude. Weigh your financial choices with great care.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Taking a greater interest in your community will bring you new social contacts. Harness your vivid imagination to practical endeavors. At work, strive for cooperation over confrontation.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Your ability to turn a hobby into a financial plus will impress prominent associates. A change in job status is a distinct possibility. Complete routine work assignments on time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Work at a steady pace today. A difficult co–worker may interfere with your attempts to concentrate. Be firm where a question of privacy or confidentiality is involved. You are right to maintain high standards.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Good timing is a vital part of your formula for success. Congenial contacts will help advance your career aims. Prove that your memory partner's trust in you is well–placed by keeping a promise.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Longer work hours will result in a better paycheck. Discuss ways to improve a close relationship. A child's suggestion gives you fresh insights. Getting more organized on the home front will prevent lots of aggravation.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Work conditions improve and so do profits. Be certain to meet any financial deadlines. Your efforts to pave the way for change would benefit from a new approach. Reach out to someone who can help.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Smarten up! Allow others to set the pace for joint activities. A willingness to compromise will be richly rewarded. Old friends show a new loyalty. Voice your appreciation, then show it in tangible ways.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Information regarding the past helps you solve a current puzzle. Count on family members to be supportive but inquisitive. Tell them just enough!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Stick to projects already underway. A surprise bonus can be a cause for celebration. Decisive or confidentiality is involved. You are right to maintain high standards!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Expansion in conjunction with your business dealings is favored. Solicit a partnership. Spending your free time with a different crowd broadens your horizons. Meet others halfway. Issuing invitations will spice up your social life.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Romance could play a prominent role in the day's plan. Do those extra little things that lift your loved one's spirits. Mend any emotional fences that may have been knocked down in recent months.

University dean stepping down after 25 years

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

After 25 years at the University of Massachusetts, Social and Behavioral Sciences dean Seymour Berger will retire from his position at the end of August 1995.

Berger said he never planned to remain in the deanship for a full five-year term and is looking forward to pursuing hobbies and traveling in the future.

The dean said ongoing budget constraints have made it difficult for him to complete plans for changes and improvements in the Department of Social and Behavioral Sciences.

"I had the conception when taking over the deanship that I would encourage faculty to develop interdisciplinary programs, particularly around continuing social programs," berger said.

"Unfinished are a number of projects we have started but haven't been able to move forward."

New programs stalled

Lack of financial and human resources, Berger said, are the primary reasons for unsuccessful completion of several social programs.

Programs in cultural studies and conflict resolution are two projects that have not yet been completed.

Berger said staff members do not have enough time to push these programs forward.

A program designed in cultural studies would pull together multiple courses based on the media and other means of cultural expression, such as books and art found on campus.

"We have such courses on campus," Berger said. "They need to be pulled together in a coherent program to help students understand cultural and personal identity."

A program in conflict resolution would make use of specialists in the field in order to assist students in dealing with conflicts found in family and business situations.

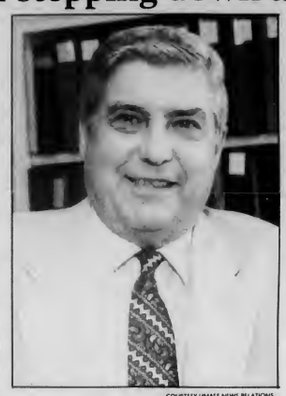
"I was hoping these programs would be done," Berger said. "Eventually they will evolve."

Lack of time, money

According to Berger, the faculty are so involved with their classes that little time is left for these programs.

"If we had more money, we could hire someone to find release time (for staff)," he said.

Release time would allow staff to get rid of one course in order to engage in social programs while another faculty member covered the class.



COURTESY UMASS NEWS RELATIONS

Retiring dean Seymour Berger

Berger said the future dean will need patience and a high tolerance for frustration as well as good social skills in working with the faculty and the staff.

"We have a good faculty and staff in this college," he said. "We don't need anyone to clean house, but the person is going to deal with difficult situations."

Berger said a future dean will be working with both a dwindling budget and a lack of resources for students.

Cuts harming students

Since 1988, he said, he has seen a large decrease in resources available to students.

"With the first cuts in 1988 to 1989 there were 188 regular faculty members in the college," Berger said. "Now there are 173 after we hired 17 faculty members two years ago."

A reduction in the number of teaching assistants (TAs) available for students in social and behavioral sciences has been seen since 1988, Berger said.

"We have lost approximately 20 percent of TAs since 1988–89," he said, adding that this decrease means the department cannot provide undergraduates with as many discussion sections.

Berger said students now have less opportunity to have teaching assistants and faculty members available to them.

With the declining availability of faculty and teaching assistants has also been a dwindling teacher equipment budget.

"The teaching equipment is essentially zero now because the budget is so tight," Berger said.

He said University students have shown throughout the past years their ability to compete successfully in the real world with institutions of greater prestige.

"A UMass education involves experience outside of the classroom," Berger said.

"There are ways in which we can improve our educational experiences in social psychology."

Teamwork needed in real world

Smaller classes and more opportunity for interchange between students and faculty are needed, Berger said.

"Our use of large classes is probably not the best way to educate our students," Berger said, and experience working in teams is important in preparing for the real world.

"Emphasis on individual performance in college is not necessarily the best training when you have to work in group environments," he said.

Berger came to the campus in 1969 and served as chairman of the psychology department in 1983. He filled the position of interim dean of Social and Behavioral Sciences in 1990 and was appointed to the full time position in 1991.

When asked what his fondest memory at the University was in the past 25 years, Berger said being a regular faculty member and having the opportunity to teach and do research at the University.

"I tried to get students to think critically, independently and creatively," he said.

Treaty signing offers another sign of hope

By Dan Perry
Associated Press

WADI ARABA, Israel-Jordan Border — Under a huge banner proclaiming peace in three languages, Israel and Jordan are signing a treaty Wednesday to end 46 years of war — pushing a vision of hope in a Middle East convulsed by Islamic fundamentalism.

The signing, to be witnessed by President Clinton and 5,000 guests, is taking place on a hastily asphalted former minefield — an apt metaphor for an uncertain future.

Despite the spectacular ceremony planned at this uninhabited patch of desert just north of the Red Sea, the Israeli mood was sober Tuesday in the aftershock of a string of terrorist attacks by Islamic fundamentalists opposed to the treaty.

Most legislators of the opposition Likud said they would stay away from the ceremony, believing it to be extravagant and insensitive to families who lost relatives in recent attacks.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was not invited, and Palestinians were skeptical about the treaty, worrying that their quest for statehood would be lost in the Arab rush to reconcile with Israel.

Arafat is angry that the treaty gives Jordan's King Hussein custody of the Islamic holy sites in Jerusalem, a city the Palestinians claim as the capital of a future Palestinian state. Arafat reasserted the claim to Jerusalem on Tuesday.

"Those who don't like it can drink from the sea of Gaza," he told 2,000 cheering students at al-Azhar University in the PLO-ruled Gaza Strip.

Israel's parliament approved the treaty overwhelmingly— 105 to 3 — after a day-long debate

Catholic priest fighting to close down 'School of Coups'

JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS / COLLEGIAN

Father Roy Bourgeois

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros
Collegian Staff

Room 171–173 in the Campus Center seems like an odd place from which to campaign for the closure of a military base in Fort Benning, Ga.

But for Father Roy Bourgeois, Monday's lecture was just another stop in his journey. From the jungles of Vietnam to the Bolivian plateau, he has been through it all to achieve his goal: closure of the United States Army School of the Americas (SOA) by Congress.

The SOA was established by the Pentagon in 1946, inside the Panama Canal Zone. The school's mission was to promote stability in the region, but to Latin Americans it soon became known as "La escuela de Golpes" — "the School of Coups."

In 1984, the SOA was forced to leave the country under the Panama Canal Treaty. Panamanian President Jorge Illueca was blunt: "Make no mistake, it's the biggest base for destabilization in Latin America." A Panamanian newspaper agreed, labelling the SOA "The School of Assassins."

The school remained underground for a few years, its location shrouded in mystery until it was discovered at Fort Benning, Ga., still under the Pentagon's auspices.

"Beginning of an awakening"

As a member of the United States Armed Forces, Bourgeois was wounded in the Vietnam conflict while fighting against the revolutionary Viet Cong. Later, while working in a Vietnamese orphanage, he was confronted with the dark side of the war: dealing every day with children whose parents had been killed in fighting. "I began to make connections," he said. "It was the beginning of an awakening."

Upon his return from Vietnam, the soldier changed generals: he was ordained a Catholic priest. In his first mission father Bourgeois was sent down to La Paz, the capital city of Bolivia.

To his disappointment, he said, he was sent to a strict conservative church. His dream of participating in community based programs was shattered. "It was like working for a Boston church but in La Paz," he grumbled. Soon he became ill and began to doubt his capability to achieve his missionary goals: "I wasn't sure I could survive there."

Encounters with SOA graduates

He was transferred to a community in the outskirts of La Paz. It was in those slums where he first became exposed to the Theologie of Liberation. This "sect" of the Catholic church arose in Latin America in the 1960s, in direct opposition to the interpretation of the gospel taught since the arrival of Columbus in the 15th century. According to Father Bourgeois they were teaching the poor that "God does not want them to suffer, He calls them to liberate themselves from that suffering."

Those teachings have been called revolutionary by local elites, governments and the Central Intelligence Agency. In Haiti, according to the CIA's own records, the agency backed General Raoul Cedras and Major Joseph-Michel Francois, an SOA graduate on the agency's payroll, in the 1991 coup d'etat against Father Jean-Bertrand Aristide, a Liberation Theologist.

"The poor become empowered, despair is replaced by hope, but it can also mean death," Father Bourgeois explained. It was no surprise to him, he said, that he was arrested and later

Candidates shout attacks in first debate

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy offered a spirited defense of liberalism and his 32-year Senate record in a debate Tuesday with GOP challenger Mitt Romney that erupted into a shouting match within minutes.

In the toughest race of his career, Kennedy found himself under attack as an advocate of an outdated liberal philosophy Romney said had failed to answer an explosion in out-of-wedlock births, illegal immigration and violent crime.

Time and again, Kennedy tried to turn the tables by saying those problems had worsened under 12 years of Republican presidents and had begun to improve thanks to his Senate leadership alongside a Democratic president.

Kennedy got indignant when Romney suggested he had gotten a sweetheart deal in a Washington real estate investment, turning to his challenger and declaring "Mr. Romney, the Kennedys are not in public service to make money. We have paid too high a price," he said.

Romney got mildly flustered a few times when Kennedy pressed him to detail how he would reach his stated goal of universal health care, or what he specifically would cut to balance the federal budget.

Kennedy appeared knocked off balance just once — after he criticized Romney for not providing health coverage to part-time workers in companies he owns. Romney retorted that Kennedy did just the same — to workers at the Chicago Merchandise Mart.

Kennedy was at a loss to answer for a moment and then said the part-timers at least had access to insurance through the company, although they had to pay for it. After the debate, however, his campaign said the seven part-time workers at the Merchandise Mart all were working second jobs there and had coverage through their primary employers.

Kennedy, the fourth most senior member of the Senate, was asked by a panel of three journalists why the race is so close when Romney, a venture capitalist and son of former Michigan Gov. George Romney, has never held elective office.

Flu epidemic not foreseen for 1994-95 school year

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The University Health Center will not be conducting widespread flu vaccinations this year as was done last year.

According to A.J. Lardner, public health nurse for the UHC, last year's mass immunization was spurred by a national flu epidemic forecast by Center for Disease Control, located in Atlanta, Ga.

Those recommendations were passed on to the Massachusetts Health Department, which then allotted the University of Massachusetts more than 6,000 vaccinations and the necessary funding to administer the widespread immunization last school year.

According to the Massachusetts Department of Public Health guidelines for the fall of 1994, "A major epidemic of influenza is not anticipated for this school year."

According to Lardner, 400 doses of flu vaccine are available at UHC for students who fall under a high risk group.

Those in a high risk group include adults and children with chronic pulmonary or cardiovascular disorders, those who have required regular medical follow-up or hospitalization the preceding year because of chronic metabolic diseases, renal dysfunction, hemoglobinopathies or immunosuppression.

Those receiving aspirin therapy and therefore are at risk of Reye's syndrome and those 65 years of age or older are also at high risk.

"We normally give our 300 to 350 vaccinations a year," Lardner said. "We have it here for students who

Holocaust dorm graffiti prompts meeting

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A Thatcher dormitory resident assistant and a student on his floor will meet with University officials this week after a political disagreement between the two prompted graffiti on the second-floor RA's door.

Andrej Mucic, a UMass student of Serbian descent, wrote a message on Abdul Kanaan's dry eraser board criticizing his political/religious views. Kanaan, a Muslim, found the writing when he got home from an RA meeting on the evening of Oct. 19, Kanaan said.

The graffiti read, "Stop the Sudan's holocaust where hundreds of thousands of Christians die starving from the fundamentalist regime. For more information contact our floor Holocaust expert," Kanaan said.

Andrej Mucic said he wrote the message because he was offended by a shirt Kanaan had worn with "Stop the Holocaust II" printed on it with a map of Yugoslavia.

The campus police responded at 10:30 p.m. The Community Disorders Unit is presently investigating the case, according to the UMass Public Safety Division.

A meeting will be held later this week between Desiree Laibeharie-Josias, the residence director of the Thatcher cluster, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin, Kanaan and Mucic, Kanaan said.

All disciplinary and judicial action is confidential, according to Laibeharie-Josias.

They will collect information on the case, respond by supporting the victim and healing the community, she said, and further repercussions would come from the Dean's Office.

Kanaan, who spent three months volunteering with the Red Cross in Bosnia in 1992, first met Mucic a year ago. By chance, Mucic ended up living on the floor Kanaan was assigned to this semester, Kanaan said.

Mucic thought the eraser board was a place for the floor to communicate because other students had written things prior to the incident, Kanaan said.

According to Kanaan, Mucic previously referred to him as a "holocaust expert," and they both have acknowledged that they have differing political views.

Mucic, who spends every summer in Serbia and has family there, said that this is a highly emotional subject which he feels very close to.

He took offense to Kanaan's shirt because it implies that the Serbians are committing a holocaust on the Muslims. This information is inaccurate and untrue, Mecic said.

"Since he was arbitrating who was committing a holocaust, and what constitutes a holocaust, I thought I'd turn the tables," Mecic said.

Market Reports

Storage shortage causes price fall

CHICAGO (AP) — Grain and soybean futures prices retreated Tuesday on the Chicago Board of Trade, erasing most of the previous day's gains as players refocused on this year's record corn and soybean crops.

An Agriculture Department report released after the close of trading Monday showed just 52 percent of the U.S. corn crop harvested as of Sunday. Midwestern farmers and grain elevators already are running low on storage space for crops and rail car availability is strained.

"We have all these storage problems and we still have 48 percent of the crop to go," said Joe Victor, marketing director for Allendale Inc., a futures brokerage firm in Crystal Lake, Ill. Soybean harvesting was 74 percent complete as of Sunday, the USDA said.

A slack export demand outlook for U.S. wheat pressured wheat futures, Victor said.

Wheat for December delivery fell 4 cents to $4.00 a bushel; December corn fell 1 3/4 cents to $2.15 1/2 a bushel; December oats fell 1 1/2 cents to $1.26 a bushel.

Inflation uncertainty causes stocks to fall

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks seesawed lower Tuesday in tandem with bonds as uncertainty reigned on the prospects for rising inflation and higher interest rates.

While major indexes jumped between positive and negative territory through the day, the broader market remained lower and most of the indexes fell into place at the close.

"Today was a spillover from yesterday. A continually weak bond market is continuing to put pressure on the equity market," said A. Marshall Acuff, market strategist with Smith Barney in New York.

Stock and bond markets have been weak for several days amid signs that growth in the U.S. economy isn't slowing down enough to prevent resurgent inflation. Investors are waiting for the Federal Reserve Board to make its next move to raise interest rates, hoping that the central bank can once-and-for-all get a handle on rising prices.

Dollar hits record low, rallies slightly through day

LONDON (AP) — The dollar ended lower against key currencies in European trading today after briefly plunging to a post-war low against the Japanese yen in New York.

Gold prices declined in Europe.

In early U.S. dealings, the dollar dipped as low as 96.50 yen — below the previous intraday record low of 96.55 set last Friday — although the greenback quickly rose to trade at 96.72 by mid-afternoon in New York.

An early drop in American bond prices and reports quoting European central bank officials as saying they had no plans to support the dollar appeared to be driving the currency lower, analysts said.

Late in London, the dollar was quoted at 96.78 yen, down from 97.20 late Monday. Earlier, in Tokyo, the dollar fell 0.64 yen to finish at 96.76, despite dollar buying by Japan's central bank to bolster the U.S. currency.

Internet connects students with info highway

University computers provide opportunities for e-mail use and other new features

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Internet is often referred to as the basis for the future information superhighway.

Internet is a system of remote computers run by universities, corporations and the government. The remote computers are linked together offering anyone with access to the system an abundant source of free information.

The University of Massachusetts operates a collection of Digital Equipment Vax Computers which are connected to Internet.

Internet can be accessed at the University in computer labs on the seventh floor of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library or in the Lederle Graduate Research Center. Internet can also be accessed from off–campus through modems and in dorms through terminal adapter units.

As of this month more than 6,000 students have accounts here at the University, according to Duncan Chesley, director of computing administration at the Office of Information and Telecommunications (OIT).

"In September, 2,800 new accounts were created, 50 percent more than a year ago," Chesley said.

Chesley said he was excited about the growing interest students at the University have in Internet.

Students interested in getting accounts on Internet can go to the OIT office in A109 Lederle Graduate Research Center, according to Jason Bostek, a senior computer science major who works at the office. Accounts cost $20.

"The cost is ridiculous because this is the only school I know of where you have to pay," said Ellen Rodrigues, a junior elementary education and psychology major.

Students can also access information about courses, bus schedules, local weather and movie listings on the Housing Services Cable Network.

Amanda Cronin, freshman pre–veterinary major, said she felt it was still better than the prices friends pay to use large commercial systems like America On Line or Prodigy.

The most common use of Internet is electronic mail, more commonly referred to as e–mail, according to Bostek. E–mail allows a student at the University to send a letter to a friend anywhere in the world almost instantaneously.

"It allows me to keep track of far away friends," said freshman Andy Meijia, who is majoring in communications.

There are numerous other popular tools on the Internet besides e–mail.

"Sometimes I get lost in the system and discover things other than mail by luck," Cronin said.

Another popular tool on Internet is the gopher, according to Bostek. The gopher is a catalog of information where students can access addresses and phone numbers of friends here at the University and at other universities around the world.

Using the UMass gopher, students can also access information about courses, bus schedules, local weather and movie listings on the Housing Services Cable Network.

Other popular features of Internet include the usenet, telnet and file transfer protocol (FTP), according to Bostek.

The usenet allows students to read and post notes on over 3,000 subjects which can be viewed by other people who have access to Internet.

Telnet allows users to access remote computers. FTP allows users to download and upload files from remote computers.

The biggest complaint students have is that during busy times of day in the labs, it can be difficult to get on to a computer.

"I'd like to see more computers because I'm forced to wait," Rodrigues said.

In presenting the pact to parliament, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin responded to Israelis' anxieties by painting a vivid portrait of peace and open borders.

The 72–year–old former general spoke of truckloads of cargo moving between Israel and Jordan, of businessmen flying to Amman in the morning, closing a deal and being back in Jerusalem by nightfall, of families taking a day trip to Petra, the ancient city in the Jordanian desert.

Recalling his first public visit to the Jordanian capital on Oct. 16, Rabin said:

"Last week we stood at night on the balcony of the king's palace in Amman, and opposite us shone the lights of Jerusalem, so near — just a few dozen kilometers — after 46 years of hostility that separated Amman from Jerusalem."

Peace advocate works to help ease oppression

By Ben Geman
Collegian Staff

LEVERETT — A small enclave carved out of the North Leverett woods, the serenity of Dr. Paula Green's home on Richardson Road near Route 63 seems far removed from the bloodiness of the Rwandan civil war.

But for Green, the savagery of a crisis long faded from newspaper headlines is part of what is drawing her to Africa in the coming weeks.

On Oct. 31, Green will embark on a three–week journey through Tanzania and Zambia to conduct a series of non– violence training workshops as part of her work with the International Fellowship of Reconciliation (IFOR), a 75–year–old peace advocacy organization conducting seminars on non–violence in countries around the world.

Working with grass–roots organizations, residents, teachers and health care workers in Tanzania and Zambia, Green will conduct the five–day workshops while traveling through the countries by bus and staying with African families.

JONAS SILVERMAN / COLLEGIAN

Peace advocate Dr. Paula Green will travel to Tanzania and Zambia next month to conduct workshops with the International Feilowship of Reconciliation.

Psychology and peace advocacy

"There are many people there who feel the need to have training in conflict management. In the wake of the Rwanda crisis, people are really interested in hands–on, non–violent work," said Green, speaking in her kitchen which overlooks a terraced garden watched by a statue of a Buddha. "It's fallen out of the news here. It's not out of their news."

The statue, about two feet tall and carved out of granite, looms above not only the garden next to Green's pinewood house, but her dedication to peace and non–violence itself.

For Green, who is a psychologist as well as a peace advocate, non–violence training and working with the IFOR means more than conflict–resolution training.

It means working for justice by helping people to realize people must look inward to help erase oppression.

"For me, there's a kind of seamless web between doing this work to lift oppression and doing inner–psychological work. We're violent to ourselves and violent to the people we care about and live with," said Green.

Finding peace in a decade of tumult

As a peace advocate, Green is no stranger to violence.

It was the Vietnam War that introduced her to social activism as a student at New York University in Manhattan's Greenwich Village in the 1960s.

Green, who marched in New York City in anti–war demonstrations during the escalation of the U.S. involvement in Vietnam, credits her activism as one of them was a chance to increase our interest in non–violence."

Green, though, is quick to point out that non–violence shouldn't be equated with passivity.

Green and IFOR view non–violence both as a tool through which the attitudes of others may be changed and a philosophy which recognizes that peace should be attained through peaceful methods.

"People have to be taught that non–violence is active," Green said. "It's very powerful."

A mission of many faiths

The IFOR has been working toward peaceful means of giving a voice to the oppressed worldwide since its creation in 1919. While it remains a profoundly spiritual organization, the IFOR doesn't promote any specific religion and accepts people of all backgrounds.

The group was founded in 1919 when an international group of Christian pacifists met in the Netherlands and began to work to evacuate starving children from Austria to the United Kingdom.

Some of the hundreds of projects undertaken by the organization since its creation have included aiding earthquake victims in India after a large earthquake in Bihar in 1931, helping Jews in Europe find safety during the Holocaust, and organizing an environmental conference in Sweden in 1972.

In the 1980s, the IFOR worked toward the end of apartheid in South Africa and the overthrow of the Marcos' dictatorship in the Philippines in 1986, according to IFOR literature.

For Green, working with the IFOR means conveying the idea that to end violence, one must work toward both the toppling of oppressive institutions and toward affecting spiritual transformation.

Green, who recently spent a year traveling in India, Nepal and Thailand conducting workshops with husband Jim Perkins, believes this transformation is the root of social change.

"If you have the radical political vision without the psychological and spiritual, there can be a lot of anger, and that anger shuts people off rather than opens them up."

Dr. Paula Green will conduct a workshop called "Personal Peace Making: Healing the Hurts" at her home in Leverett on Oct. 29 at 10 a.m. Call the Traprock Peace Center at 773–7427 for more information.

expelled from Bolivia because of his work in forming a human rights commission to examine the abuses committed by the government of General Hugo Banzer, another SOA graduate and the school's first "Hall of Fame" inductee in 1988. At Fort Benning, Banzer's picture hangs in the school's foyer next to other famous graduates.

Father Bourgeois returned to the United States. When he learned about the atrocities of the SOA he began to speak against the school. However, he was soon sent to El Salvador. In the 1980s, the small Central American Republic was immersed in one of the bloodiest civil wars in the hemisphere. The Salvadorean government was fighting a counterinsurgency war against leftist guerrillas that advocated land redistribution in a country where the meaning of land and power are closely intertwined.

The trip proved to be an encounter with another SOA alumnus. During this time the United States spent $6 billion supporting the Salvadorean government, including funding for training at the SOA. The graduates proved to be effective.

Father Oscar Romero, a Catholic priest, asked soldiers during a Mass to disobey orders requesting assassinations. It was his last sermon; two SOA graduates were later implicated, according to the United Nations Truth Commission. Later, three other graduates participated in the killing of two U.S. nuns.

Bourgeois was outraged. He went back to Fort Benning and met with some old friends. Dressed as high ranking officers and wearing patches with the names of the two murdered nuns and Father Romero, they entered the school in the middle of the night. They placed a boom box outside the barracks of the Salvadorean officers, and blasted father Romero's last sermon.

"I said to myself: Father Romero, this one's for you," recounted Father Bourgeois. They were taken to the county jail, questioned by the FBI, tried, convicted and sentenced to 18 months in prison.

Battle in Congress

Incarceration gave Bourgeois the time to begin his letter campaign to close down the school. Little progress was made until the murder of six Jesuits in El Salvador shocked the world. Congress reacted by making military funding conditional to improvements in the country's human rights record. However, the school was not mentioned.

It wasn't until a Newsweek story denouncing the school and its activities that members of Congress took real notice of the SOA. In a time of budget austerity, the school became an easy target. With close to a $6 million annual operating budget, a recent $30 million renovation of its headquarters, and perks including free baseball tickets and passes to Disney World for students, proponents of closure had plenty of ammunition.

"This institution costs us millions of dollars a year and identifies us with tyranny and oppression," said Rep. Joseph Kennedy of Massachusetts during congressional hearings. The school trains 2,000 Latin Americans every year in everything from military intelligence to commando tactics. However, the school provides no instruction in defense against foreign invasions.

Dan Hamburg, a Democrat from California, goes even further: "There can be no mistake that the School of the America's has trained some of the most despised and corrupt military officers in Latin America." Manuel Noriega, Hugo Banzer, Joseph–Michel Francois and Phillipe Biambi are all graduates of the SOA.

A bill sponsored by Kennedy calling for a cut in all funding for the school was defeated in a vote of 217 to 175. Since then, Bourgeois has staged hunger strikes on the Capitol's steps.

"Each fasting brings something good," he said. Recently actress Susan Sarandon agreed to narrate a video documentary entitled "School of Assassins." Father Bourgeois is touring the country speaking to small audiences like the one at the Campus Center and preparing for more fasts. He hopes they will bring something good when the bill is reintroduced in the spring.

Relatively healthy students need not receive a vaccine this year, although a nurse is always available by phone.

"You come down with flu for a few days, feel horrible, but you get over it," Lardner said. "People at high risk may come down with serious complications, perhaps life threatening complications."

Lardner said the UHC is a surveillance site for influenza, reporting to the Massachusetts Department of Public Health which then reports to the CDC.

AMMAN, Jordan — Key elements seem missing from the international peace pageant unrolling in this small desert kingdom: the hearts and minds of its people.

Grab anyone at random and you find more a sense of dread than excitement at the thought of watching Jordan sign a peace treaty with Israel in the presence of President Clinton and thousands of guests on Wednesday.

"It's like you smell a rotten container of yogurt. You know it's rotten but somehow you can't help yourself smelling it before throwing it away," said Toujan Faisal, the only woman in Jordan's 80–member parliament.

Former military officers who were in the Jordanian army when it lost Jerusalem to Israel in 1967 did not expect it to turn out like this.

"I remember the knocked out vehicles, bodies all over the place, the war was hot," said retired Maj. Gen. Yousef A. Kawash, recalling a reconnaissance trip to the Allenby Bridge in 1967. "I never dreamed of this."

The treaty will be signed in Wadi Araba, on one of the main caravan routes making Jordan a key crossing point in the Middle East since ancient times.

By signing a peace treaty with Jordan, Israel is hoping to move out on those routes across the region.

Nabil Sawalha is Jordan's leading comic actor. He said the Israelis were pressing him to take his current play to a 4,000–seat theater in Tel Aviv, an idea the troupe rejected.

"There is something final about this treaty: There goes Palestine. It leaves a bad taste," Sawalha said. "We've been at war for 50 years, apart from the 5,000 years before that. You don't want to normalize in a week."

Under the treaty, the border is supposed to open Nov. 1 and embassies within a month. Fearing that thousands of Israelis will descend on the ancient city of Petra, Jordan has limited their numbers.

King Hussein is selling the treaty as an economic boon to Jordan, hard hit by the cutoff in Arab aid for its sympathy with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein after he invaded Kuwait.

"It is time that this nation rise from its doldrums and overcome the stagnation that has affected its progress," he said in a speech. But even the king conceded he might be a little ahead of the country's 3.9 million people.

"I think that it will still take a bit of time for our people to adjust to the fact that we have arrived at our destination," he said.

The strongest support comes from businessmen who expect new prosperity from the accord because of foreign investments. The United States has written off its $980 million portion of Jordan's $6.8 billion in international debt. But opponents see American aid as bribery and say no amount of prosperity can replace lost Palestinian land.

Bitter criticism wells up in places like the Baqaa Refugee Camp, 15 miles north of Amman. It is home to more than 150,000 Palestinians.

"They can pour gold and dollars on our heads. We don't want it, we want to return to Palestine," said Ahmed, a 45–year–old grocery shop owner. He hauled in his 4–year–old son Mohammed to sing the chorus to a Palestinian anthem.

UMass professor honored with fellowship selection

By Christopher Hassett

Raymond S. Bradley, professor of geology and geography at the University of Massachusetts, has been selected to receive a fellowship to the Arctic Institute of North America.

He was named in honor of "a distinguished career in climatic variability and global change research, particularly in the Arctic." Bradley's career spans 20 years of Arctic research.

"Most of the time we're looking at how the environment has changed since the last Ice Age to the present," Bradley said.

Bradley spent last summer with three graduate students, Doug Hardy, Carsten Braun and Marianne Douglas, in the Canadian Arctic researching regional climactic changes over the last 1,000 years.

"In the past, we've found the climate of the past 100 years is remarkably different than the last 1,000 years," he said.

Bradley is an expert climatologist who has previously studied monsoons in Asia and global climactic changes.

Last February, he served on a panel about the Ice Age for the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

"We hope to continue research in the Canadian Arctic," Bradley said. "We want to put our modern climate in perspective."

"He's a crazy person in the field. He's my boss and advisor, but he's also my friend," Braun said.

"He's wonderful to work with," said Hardy. "Every little thing sparks new ideas with him."

"He assumes his full responsibility with everything, even the most mundane aspects of camp life, be it cooking or cleaning the dishes. He's quite a good cook."

Hardy recalled a story Bradley told him of a summer when Bradley, after weeks of planning another research camp, forgot to bring his raincoat with him up to the Arctic.

"He keeps the big picture in mind," Hardy said, "but the little details are not of much interest to him."

Bradley has been a faculty member since 1973 and has been head of the geography and geology department since 1993.

Opinion/Editorial

Sharing confessions at the diner

"Listen, I just want to have sex with him," she said, rather exasperated. "He's talking about me wanting commitment and a relationship, and all I'm thinking is 'I just want to have sex with you.'" And so our typical diner conversation began to get more interesting.

"Is that wrong of me? I mean, I'm not saying there is no emotional involvement going on, because I do really like him, but to be perfectly honest the physical is outweighing the emotional."

E.C. Thomas

Well, indeed we were being perfectly honest, as all of our diner chats always have been. The diner is funny that way. It's become a sort of church, where confessions are always kept within the four walls, and between the two of us, our coffee and the cigarettes she invariably chain smokes during these periods of emotional reckoning.

"No I don't think it's wrong," I replied. "I think it's pretty hysterical." Our diner confessionals have spanned a period of about seven years. And as she was talking I couldn't help but realize how much we'd grown up, how much had changed. High school confessions were never like this.

"No, come on, it's not funny, I don't know what to do." But it was funny, it was absolutely hysterical. Our diner conversation had taken on an entirely different level of substance. I started laughing.

"What?!" she said, frustrated at my finding this humorous.

"I just think it's funny how much things have changed. I mean look at us, we're in the diner, having coffee as usual, and yet we aren't the little high schoolers we used to be. Instead we are these two living, breathing hormones. Who would have thought?"

She began laughing. "Yeah, I guess it is pretty strange. But we're good like that."

We began reminiscing a bit. A sort of disbelief began to transcend our laughter, a disbelief at the way things had changed — the way we had changed. It was strange. Like when you were in middle school and you thought sex was the most horrendously weird experience. You just couldn't completely see yourself doing it. Then in high school, there was a certain taboo excitement to it all. And now we were in college and couldn't figure out how we could ever think differently.

"But seriously," she said, "I really don't know what to do. I'm so frustrated. I mean, can you imagine me — me — sitting next to him after he goes through the whole relationship spiel, and I reply, 'I just want to have sex with you' — I almost want to do it just to see the look on his face."

"I just think it's funny that there is such a role reversal going on here. Guys have been doing that sort of thing for a long time," I said.

"I know, so why is it so wrong for me?" she asked.

All of sudden I knew our diner chat was going to take on a level of philosophy that diner chats inevitably do. "It's not. It's just weird because society has built it up that way."

"I suppose. I just don't get it. Why is it so wrong to want to have sex with someone solely based on the physical aspect of it? I mean if I went to him and said, 'Look, I just want to have sex with you' — and we did, I know that later I would feel like I had lost all sense of self-respect, and all respect that he had for me.

"But why is that so? I got what I wanted so why should I lose any self-respect? And as for him, I was just being honest; why can't that be respected?" she looked at me, the wrinkle in between her eyes growing deeper as it always does when she knows she is making sense but isn't sure if the other party understands it. But having known her for nearly 10 years, I had acquired the deciphering technique.

"I think it all has to do with the fact that women nowadays are so confused about their sexuality. While being liberated, they still have to keep their sexuality locked up in some distant closet. We still have this notion that women aren't supposed to be sexually eager. That they are sluts if they act out what they want sexually," I said.

"So I'm a slut because all I want right now is to have sex with this person? Because I'm being honest with myself about what I want, I'm a slut. It makes no sense. I mean, you know I'm not a slut. In fact I can't even believe we are having this conversation. Three years ago, I would never be saying this. Even now, I feel weird admitting to it."

"Exactly," I said. "It's weird, because you aren't supposed to be feeling this way. It's like women have been liberated in the kitchen, but the bedroom is a totally different story."

I began thinking about the "Sex in America: A Definitive Story" article I read in The New York Times a couple of weeks ago. It found that basically men and women live in different sexual worlds — as if that was so definitive. After reading the results, I was still puzzled over what men and women really think. To state that men think about sex more than women isn't any big discovery. And while women generally want some sort of emotional involvement within the act itself, what about the times when emotion isn't such a big issue for them? Who says that is wrong? Besides, isn't lust an emotion?

I knew my friend wasn't a slut. In fact, I was pretty proud of her for opening up her sexual floodgates. She never was one to admit to things like this. Having had a bad experience with sex, it was nice to hear that she was finally reaching a point of freeing herself from it. But the guy she was talking about wouldn't know how flattered he should be over her newfound sense of liberation.

"You know what's kind of sad about all of this?" she asked pensively.

"What?" I replied.

"The fact that even if women could be socially honest about what they really want, we'd still have to explain why when we were saying 'no' we really meant 'no.' If we were to admit the fact that sometimes we really do just want to have sex, the whole concept of communicating 'no' would be a disaster. We can't win either way."

"I know," I said. We sat quietly for a moment, stirring our coffee and listening to the background banter of diner chit– chat and food orders going in and coming out. Everything seemed to stop and move in slow motion.

And then the crashing of silverware and glasses seemed to bring us back out of the little world we had created within our corner booth, and my friend lit up a cigarette, inhaled and said, "So what do I do?"

I laughed softly. "I have no idea."

Gathering gifts bestowed by college

As the semester continues, I am beginning to realize that the dearth of concentrated effort in the pursuit of knowledge has become frighfully apparent. This thought came to me a couple of weeks ago.

Feeling kind of uptight, but not in a malicious way centering more towards an unreachable delight, I happened to sit down and read King Lear once again. Then a brutal realization swept over me.

Jorma Kansanen

I ain't no John Keats.

The mood of the piece, though, made me peruse the thoughts and feelings that encompass my own psychological outlook both personally and regarding the semester's trials and tribulations that face all of us.

I am here to bring up this certain little word. This word has the largest of implications, both locally and globally, and entails concepts and feelings that we do not always want to face.

Knowledge.

Usually in this space the writer will start right away by either lambasting a particular organization that, by the lack of knowledge, has said or done something that threatens stability. Or they take the personal route and attempt to make a connection with the reader on a one–to–one basis with something we all can understand or have direct knowledge of. (Like getting sloppy drunk, adjusting to life away from home, etc.)

Myself, I'm not criticizing the topics of these columns. That is what this designated space is made for. Giving your opinion or editorializing on a specific topic that relates to you or irks the you know what out of you. A distinct, educated personal opinion is one of the greatest gifts ever given to the human species.

But guess what one of the worst, and truly intellectually deadly, gifts known to man is?

That's right, a totally uneducated one.

I do not know if it is a concentrated fear, or a general notion of doing things the easy way, that drives the majority of students to shy away from receiving the maximum out of a college education. Not even that, per se, but out of the experience as a whole. When was the last time you saw someone who put their all into a particular class while everyone else chose to center that person out? Instead of stepping up and using their true "ego" to better themselves in the pursuit of knowledge, they would rather soothe that aspect of their persona that is threatened and weed that person out as a "brown–noser."

What you have to realize is that there is only one person who can judge things the way they are supposed to be seen. And that is you. If you choose to goose–step in time with your friends, or by the dreadful concept of procrastination not feel you have the time to make specific decisions of a religious, social and personal nature, that option in the long run is going to fly back ten–fold in your face. The basic concept of education is to round out the individual on both personal and historically based terms. On the other hand, don't strike out on your own and leave all your friends behind. That would be asinine. But you have to make a distinction.

Don't you want to know what you're talking about?

Or do you prefer someone else making your proverbial bed for you?

That is one of the sticking points in this argument. I am not here to stand on the mount and preach this sermon while I look down on all you heathens. (Give me a break, because I know some of you are going to feel that way.) All I am attempting to do through the use of biting sarcasm and semi– rhetorical euphemisms is to get all your fertile minds to think for themselves — especially all the ever–younger faces that have deluged the streets and walkways of this small yet culturally enormous community.

We possess enough socio–political dilemmas in this world, not disregarding our own Pioneer Valley, already. I don't care if the cause you're supporting contains the highest virtues known to the history of mankind. If you do not know what you are talking about and profess that you do, credibility is thrown right out the window in my book. (Do you still want to be a big star, Mr. Jones?)

In the same frame of mind of the aforementioned Keats' poem, out of the darkness I can see the phoenix rise out of the ashes. No matter how much I go overboard on my exclamations of knowledge and its self–developing attributes, a feeling that all is not lost and still can be found envelops any previous statement on my part in this editorial.

As Ralph Waldo Emerson had put it, in a much darker time in American history, in his work Self–Reliance: "Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Absolve you to yourself, and you shall have the suffrage of the world."

Letters to the Editor

Source of former protest actually a freedom symbol

To the editor:

A year ago, the state of Massachusetts and the nation was engaged in an intense debate over the history of the Minuteman in response to an attempt to remove a representative image of them as the school mascot at the University of Massachusetts. Over the past year, I have watched some noticeable changes take place both at home and abroad. Just this month, the Board of Trustees at UMass voted to name the school library after the civil rights activist and founder of the NAACP, W.E.B. DuBois.

Also this month, President Nelson Mandela was officially received at the White House as head of state of a new, democratic South Africa. And finally, of course, there was Saturday's jubilant celebration of the return of exiled President Jean–Bertrand Aristide of Haiti marking the climax of Operation Restore Democracy.

As I pondered these historic breakthroughs for human rights and democracy across the globe, I found myself searching to identify the source of this wondrous ideal called freedom which has driven the tremendous social changes that have taken place over the past five years. Ironically, I found that source to be the very same symbol which I led the protest against last year at UMass — the Minuteman.

Arriving at the Minuteman National Park and travelling the Battle Road to the Old North Bridge, I felt the spirit of these freedom fighters who fought so valiantly to bring forth this ideal called "freedom" which would eventually become the salvation of humanity.

Across that bridge stood the Minuteman Statue, which in 1875 had been dedicated by President Ulysses S. Grant at a centennial celebration of the "shot heard 'round the world." From that very spot where the statue stood, President Grant hoped the Minuteman could serve as a symbol around which America could heal the deep wounds left behind from the Civil War that had ended 10 years ago.

Today in 1994, America is still suffering from deep divisions that are political, social, cultural and spiritual. Now that Operation Restore Democracy has passed a crucial stage, it is high time for Americans everywhere to come together to "restore America."

Without a unified nation working together on common values and principles, all of our problems, whether foreign or domestic, will continue to worsen. President Clinton and Congress are far qualified to manage such a challenge alone. With the unified support of the American people, there is nothing that cannot be achieved.

And thus it would be most fitting to recognize the symbol of the birth of this nation, the Minuteman, as a source of unity around which real renewal of America can finally begin.

Sexism can work in both directions

I was in a clothing store recently when I overheard a woman ask aloud to no one in particular, "How do you measure a man's neck?"

"Strangle him," was the response, and it brought about gales of laughter from the other customers, all of whom happened to be women.

The incident didn't bother me so much until I thought about it some more. What if the situation were reversed? What if I had suggested strangulation to determine a woman's collar size? I'd be branded as a misogynistic, abusive control freak and run out of town on a rail.

The woman who made the original comment would probably be called "quick–witted" and "independent." While these are certainly admirable traits, I'm sure there are better ways of demonstrating them than threatening to choke the life out of somebody.

The entire incident only bears mentioning because it points at something larger, the double standard in discrimination and sexism. In other words, men are the victims of sexism as well as women, albeit in much more subtle ways.

Now, before everyone starts getting their giblets in an uproar, do me a favor and answer these questions for yourselves, honestly.

What would your first reaction be if a man filed a sexual harassment suit against a woman? If he charged a woman with rape? If he filed domestic violence charges against his spouse?

Who usually gets the short end of the stick in custody battles?

Who has had almost all the world's problems blamed on them either directly or indirectly?

Sure, it's easy for someone to say, "What's good for the goose is good for the gander," but does that make it right? Is the way to stop the objectification of the sexes really to simply turn the tables?

Have you seen the television lately? If the roles were reversed, two new ads would have people storming the networks with pitchforks and torches, hanging advertising executives if effigy, and rightfully so. The ads in question are the new Diet Coke and Calvin Klein spots. Both feature a group of women ogling a scantily clad man without his knowledge. The women in the Calvin Klein ad go so far as to videotape the man showering. This is progress?

Now, just imagine for a minute the outrage, the letters, phone calls and negative publicity the ads would have received if the gender roles were reversed. Shown as is, however, not a peep.

Have women been oppressed throughout the years? Of course they have, I'd be foolish not to see that. On the other hand how long must the sons pay for the sins of the fathers?

Men are not inherently evil. The Y chromosome does not automatically drive someone to desperate acts of oppression. Not all men find Andrew Dice Clay hilarious, or so have their walls adorned with centerfolds, or scream sexist comments out of moving car windows, or commit date rape. We aren't all thick–skulled, semi–literate, knuckle–dragging primates being led around by our penises in search of some meaningless sexual encounter just so we have something to talk about over beer and cigars at a poker game.

Some men do act this way, and that is a true disgrace, but these men do not represent the entire 50 percent of the species. It's become too easy to blame things on something else, whether it's another person, another race, another religion, another ideology, or another gender. Society today is always looking for a fall guy, and it seems that the "scapegoats du jour" are men.

So, how about this instead? [Men and women] put aside all our petty bickering and start working together to change things. Instead of blaming each other for all the world's ills perhaps we could engage in dialogue to actually fix problems instead of wasting time trying to determine who started them. How about everyone realizing that sexism works both ways, and that portraying men in the same ways that women have fighting against isn't retribution or "fair play," it's just embarrassing. For geese and gander alike.

Anatomy of a local band: Spotlighting new acts on Valley scene

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the second in a two–part series focusing on the local band scene.

While the Valley has always had a large quantity of bands, in the last few years there seems to have been an emergence of acts trying their hand at the musical gamble. While it is true many of these bands will fade away as quickly as they appear, a few are showing promise.

Sourpuss, a relatively new band on the local scene, has already formed a strong buzz around their guitar–oriented angular style of pop. The group has been together since last June and has played numerous shows throughout the area, earning them a reputation as a high energy band.

"Everyone in the band loves music," said Sourpuss guitarist Ken Mauri. "Because we enjoy playing, it doesn't bother us to make lots of long distance calls or not getting paid much for gigs."

"We never started out with any goals," said Eric Poulin of the band Knuckle Sandwich. "We just want it to be fun. When you see us up on stage, you can't imagine how much fun we are having."

Sourpuss has recently finished recording their debut 7" record entitled Rocket Day, which should be out in stores soon, and plans to play a benefit show at The Green River Cafe on Nov. 4 with Tizzy and another area band, Pirate Jenny.

Local act Sourpuss recently finished recording their debut 7" Rocket Day.

Pirate Jenny, which specializes in good, catchy riffs and melodic double vocals, is also fairly new to the scene. Sprouting from the band Flower Thief (which also boasts members of Tizzy) who began in 1991, Pirate Jenny formed last February and since has played multiple shows throughout the area.

"There have been a couple of small labels looking to put out our stuff," said guitarist/bassist Aimee Swift. "But basically we have just been playing locally a lot."

Having already played a show in Worcester, the group hopes to play more outside of the area but also enjoys playing in the Valley.

"This is our project, and we are just doing our thing," Swift said.

While a surge of new bands has cropped up recently, the area does play host to some local legends that have become more or less mainstays on the scene. Ray Mason, singer, guitarist and frontman for The Ray Mason Band, has been playing the area for years and has pretty much seen it grow to where it is today.

"Even in the Sixties there were lots of bands playing in the area," Mason recalled. Born in Holyoke, he started in his first band in 1965 and hasn't stopped yet. Forming The Ray Mason Band in 1981, Mason has played all over New England and has become a bit of a local icon due to his no frills, plugged straight into the amp style, and exclusive use of Sears Silvertone guitars.

COURTESY DAVID OSEPOWICZ

"I just plug in and play. I don't see it as retro, I just enjoy the whole live aspect," says Mason. "I've played with quite a few bands, and with every kind of musician. The main thing you have to do is start playing out of town."

On top of constantly playing live, The Ray Mason Band has recently released their debut album Between Blue and Okay, and hopes to put out a new one by next March or April.

While most of the aforementioned bands have been somewhat rooted in the "pop" vein, the Valley is home to a wide variety of bands dabbling in other musical categories. One brand of music that rules in the Valley and never goes out of style is good, old, down and dirty rock and roll. Bands such as yeP!, Borderland and Monghani have been churning out improvisational blues and jazz–based rock on club stages all over the Valley.

And while all of these acts have been growing in popularity, area band Synaesthesia has created the biggest buzz. Landing the opening slot on last year's UMass Spring Concert, the band has been garnering more and more attention thanks in part to their precise musicianship and improvisational style. "A lot of [our music] is live. We are always trying out a lot of improv, trying to be spur of the moment," said drummer Jason McIssac.

Lately the six–piece band — all friends since before the band began — have been playing largely in Amherst but have played in Boston as well. "We just love playing music," McIssac said. "I wouldn't be able to live without it."

Also straying in a different direction is area band Architectural Metaphor. The band began as an art project quite awhile ago and reached a career high opening for Seventies' experimentalists Hawkwind in 1990.

After personal trouble forced members to put the band on hiatus, Architectural Metaphor reformed last September and are on a mission to open your mind. Seeing themselves as a cross between Pink Floyd, Tangerine Dream and Hawkwind, the three–piece band has been taking music and adding a whole other dimension.

"We're head–cleaning music," said member Debbie Young. "It weirds some people out because they would be used to seeing the same bands all the time and their perspective would be so limited."

Having already played shows at such established Boston clubs as The Rat and The Middle East, the band is gearing up for shows in New York.

One band which is taking its musical career in stride is local favorite Knuckle Sandwich. With their energetic and goofy live shows, and their "everything but the kitchen sink" style, the boys have been building quite a reputation.

"We defy categorization. A little ska, a little funk, and some old school punk," said guitarist Eric Poulin. "We all have very different influences, and I think it comes out in the music."

While the band would obviously enjoy success, they're priorities are still quite in check. "We never started out with any goals," Poulin said. "We just want it to be fun. When you see us up on stage, you can't imagine how much fun we are having."

And in the end that may just be the defining aspect of playing on the local level. While all struggling musicians indeed want to be signed, the main thing that drives them is the love of creating and playing music.

"I just think it's about having fun together," said Jen Gallahorn of Tizzy. If you don't enjoy playing with the people in your band then what is the point. Thankfully we all get along real good."

Wuerffel replaces Florida's Terry Dean as QB

By Fred Goodall
Associated Press

GAINESVILLE, Fla. — It's official. Danny Wuerffel is in and Terry Dean, a Heisman Trophy hopeful just two weeks ago, is out as Florida's starting quarterback.

"I've done a lousy job coaching Terry Dean," coach Steve Spurrier said Tuesday, ending speculation that began after the senior was benched during the second half of the fifth-ranked Gators' 36-33 loss to Auburn.

"I'm a firm believer that players generally play about like they're coached. I've not been able to get Terry to quite play like I'd like him to, so that's a reflection on poor coaching. If you're a pretty decent coach, your players play pretty much like you ask them to play."

Spurrier, 44-11 at Florida, was criticized following the loss to Auburn for poor play-calling as well as his handling of Dean the week before the game, which cost the Gators (5-1) the No. 1 ranking.

Dean, who has 19 touchdown passes this season, said the coach told him on two occasions he would be benched if he played poorly. Spurrier kept his word on game day, switching to Wuerffel in the third quarter after Dean tossed his fourth interception.

The team, which was idle last week, was told Monday that Wuerffel will start this week against Georgia. Spurrier didn't announce the decision publicly until Tuesday, when he stressed that he doesn't plan to play musical quarterbacks.

"Right now Danny Wuerffel is our quarterback just like Terry Dean was. He will have an opportunity to lead us the rest of the way," Spurrier said. "If it comes to a point some time and we think somebody else can play better than Danny, then that's my responsibility to put that player in. But this is his game, and he'll have the same opportunity Terry had to be the quarterback of this team."

Wuerffel completed his first nine passes and finished 10-of-13 for 171 yards and three TDs against Auburn.

At age two I discovered my toes. At fifteen I felt the grass beneath my feet for the first time and knew that my feet were in sync with the ground. As time went on my passion to feel my feet pounding on the earth's surface grew and became my life. Hearing the sound of my feet on grass, pavement, or anything let me know that I could jump anywhere, anytime, any distance. Jumping became my life. Jumping. Everywhere. I believed in myself and had faith in my feet. My great feet. My wonderful feet.
My jumping feet.

Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

Indie–pop faves Frente! plays Pearl St.

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

The attention on the Australian quartet Frente! has been growing since the debut of Marvin The Album earlier this year, and they will bring their catchy indie-pop tunes to Pearl Street in Northampton this Thursday night.

The band, consisting of Angie Hart on vocals, guitarist Simon Austin, bassist Tim O'Connor and drummer Alistair Barden, has enjoyed somewhat of a quick rise to stardom in their home country. Formed in 1988, Frente! was voted Best New Band in Rolling Stone/Australia's Reader's Poll just a little over a year after their first gig and Marvin The Album went to number one on the independent charts.

After capturing the attention of college radio early on with the song "Labour of Love," Hart and company earned themselves a spot in MTV's "Buzz Bin" with their acoustic cover of the classic New Order dance song "Bizarre Love Triangle." The success of these songs has now landed another of the tracks from Marvin, "Ordinary Angels," on the "Melrose Place" soundtrack.

Frente! will be joined by the Gigolo Aunts, a Boston band who, after achieving some success overseas and in the states with several singles and an EP in the past two years, is touring in support of their first full length (and major label) release, Flippin' Out.

This will not, however, be the first time the Gigolo Aunts have been on the road in support of a larger act. Touring in support of Suede and the Cranberries has allowed the band to get their feet wet in venues around the United States, Japan and Europe.

It seems that other countries have discovered these two talented bands before we have, even though one is stationed right in our own backyard. Perhaps it's time we find out just what people on three other continents are talking about.

Frente!, Gigolo Aunts and local band Home will be at Pearl Street on Thursday night. The show is 18+ and starts at 8 p.m.

Series targets campus arts censorship

By Gayle Dougherty
Collegian Staff

Contemporary artists are still waging a war against censorship.

In response to this controversial issue, the Fine Arts Center is teaming up with the Residential Arts Program and the Department of Multicultural Programs to present Banned on Campus: Responding to Censorship in the Visual Arts.

A two-hour reception will be held Oct. 27 from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. at Hampden Gallery.

This event will mark the beginning of a diverse art forum that will span three weeks.

"Censorship is an important issue in the arts that is often the focus of controversy. Hampden Gallery is a facility we're using as a part of educational programs to explore such issues," said Martha Hauston, visual arts coordinator for the Residential Arts Program.

The reception on Thursday will unveil artwork from a variety of media by faculty, staff and student artists from the Five College network. These works will remain on display through Nov. 18.

Hors d'oevres will be served and Hybrid Axe (Susan Jahoda and Robert Blake of the UMass art faculty) will perform briefly during the reception, Hauston said.

Hauston is in charge of creating educational art programs for the Five College community, along with Mark Baszak, the assistant director of multicultural programs, and Lisa Kochanski, assistant visual arts co-ordinator for Residential Arts and the Hampden Gallery director.

According to Hauston, the trio has been planning the Banned On Campus forum since last January.

In addition to the exhibits, faculty from UMass, Hampshire College and Amherst College will lead several lectures about censorship.

Special guests Barbara Hammer, a filmmaker from California, and James Montford from the University of Rhode Island art department will also lead discussions.

Hauston stressed that discussion of varied opinions is the primary objective of the Banned On Campus forum.

"Rather than presenting a specific agenda, we're providing a forum for people to discuss their different points of view," Hauston said.

Hampden Gallery is open Monday through Friday, 3 p.m. to 7 p.m., and Sundays, 2 to 5 p.m. During hours of operation the gallery will provide a reading area featuring literature regarding issues and incidents of censorship.

With the NHL not playing, college hockey has a chance to make a significant jump. Next to the Bruins and the Red Sox, Hockey East is NESN's biggest draw.

Boston University comes in ranked No. 1 in the nation and will try to make a run at their second consecutive trip to the title game. UMass–Lowell is coming off a great season and should continue to grow, while Northeastern and New Hampshire have assembled their best teams in recent memory. Even Boston College, despite their off season turmoil, is still a big draw.

With 40 Bruins home dates potentially gone from their programming scheduling, NESN could likely fill the vacant spots with more Hockey East coverage.

There is definitely something to be said for small arenas when it comes to college hockey.

The atmosphere surrounding the UMass–Lowell River Hawks is fantastic in their hockey-only sports program. The fans are loud and they know the game.

It would take 6,000 more fans to create the same atmosphere at the Mullins Center.

The Lowell student radio station (WUML) said that Lowell students were offended that UMass–Amherst did not have the word Amherst on their uniforms. They claimed that it was lack of respect for their athletic program.

That might be right, except they don't have an athletic program: they have a hockey team. Some of their teams are not even Division I. Get over it.

Random thought on political correctness: UMass–Lowell changed their mascot because the chief was offensive to Native Americans, yet their home rink is still named after Joseph Tully, a convicted felon.

abilities and people just aren't used to it."

The prospect of dealing with those skills is a daunting one for UMass opponents.

"If they're focused on where she is then they're not focused on scoring goals," Donnelly said. "That's a big advantage. You want your sweeper to have a presence."

From her position, Hart can see the entire field, a vantage point that allows her to direct and instruct her teammates.

"Everybody looks to her to make the right decisions. She controls the defense. That's going to be tough to replace. She is a game leader," Donnelly said.

Off the field Hart is quiet.

"She's much quieter off the field, more one on one," said Donnelly. "She's not one to say 'this is what the team is going to do.' The team counts on her for a lot on the field, so why not kick back when you can."

Field hockey was not always Hart's first love. She was a member of the Great Britain nation track and field squad as a shot put and discus thrower, while field hockey had always been something she had just played for fun. She passed up a chance to go to Iowa State on a track scholarship to stay with her career in England, but when then–UMass Coach Pam Hixon offered here a chance to play field hockey at UMass, Hart took her skills across the Atlantic.

"I love hockey," said Hart, who considers herself somewhat of a perfectionist. "I try to be very precise. I get annoyed if I only hit 80 percent of the balls well."

Now, with her career winding down, Donnelly cringes when she thinks of the prospect of trying to replace Hart.

"I doubt that there is anybody out there who is going to come in and give the offensive and defensive ability that she did," Donnelly said. "There are people that leave their mark. There are people who stick out in your mind as being associated with UMass, and Natalie is one."

Germany's finest professional clubs. He also spent three years with Gutersluh, a lower level club near his hometown.

At 6-foot-2, Bremke is usually one of the tallest players on the pitch. He uses his height well, frequently heading balls other players cannot reach. He has also scored several times with his head, as he did yesterday. But this time he hooked up with his overseas counterpart, Giahi.

"It was easy for me to score," Bremke said. "It was an excellent cross by Hossein, and that was it."

Bremke was always a marking back in Deutschland, but in America he's developed into a lethal goal scorer, a transition he enjoyed.

"This is the first time I've been moved to the midfield, and I feel quite at home," Bremke said.

"We're happy they're here," Koch said. "We put [Bremke] where he helps us most, and we hope Hossein will start to finish some of his chances too."

Giahi may be excused for his lackluster performance in another game he recently started, against Providence College at Szot Park in Chicopee. The game was played on a brisk, breezy evening, and the conditions did not agree with the Middle East native.

"I really couldn't breathe," Giahi said. "It was very cold, and I just couldn't run."

He's off and running now, and he could be hard to stop.

Men's soccer knocks off Holy Cross Crusaders

Minutemen take HC in a 2-0 win, now preparing for Friday's A-10 match with St. Bonnies

By Brian Gormley
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team overcame fatigue and the possibility of a letdown to blank Holy Cross at home yesterday, 2-0.

The non-league win improved Massachusetts' record to 10-5-1 overall. The team can now prepare for their last Atlantic 10 game Friday at home against St. Bonaventure.

Holy Cross	0

A win would give them their first ever regular season A-10 championship.

Despite the fact that both teams had good scoring opportunities in the first half, neither could find the back of the net. Good defense by both teams and some excellent saves by Massachusetts goalkeeper Mark Wolf and Holy Cross goalkeeper Chris Murphy made for an uneventful first 45 minutes.

But Massachusetts broke free of the defensive struggle in the second half. Forward Hossein Giahi took the ball on a quick counter and drove toward the net on the left wing. He then hit midfielder Karstin Bremke, who was streaking in front of the net, with a well-placed crossing pass. Bremke leaped and headed the ball past Murphy to give the Minutemen a 1-0 lead at 55:11.

"It was an easy goal for me," Bremke said. "It was a great cross from Hossein and I got around my man and just headed it in."

Just over three minutes later, Massachusetts got on the board again. Once again Giahi was the catalyst. He dribbled the ball down the center of the field to the edge of the goalkeeper box and then led midfielder Kevin Martin on the left wing. Martin collected the pass and delivered a crossing pass to midfielder Mike Doyle, who slid in front of the net and poked it in to make the score 2-0.

Massachusetts controlled play for most of the second half, keeping the ball in the Holy Cross end and getting several good scoring chances. Bremke attributed the turnaround to better ball movement by Massachusetts and a lack of concentration by Holy Cross.

"In the first half they [Holy Cross] kept their composure and they defended well, and we didn't have many opportunities," he said. "In the second half we moved the ball well, and they sort of gave up after the second goal."

"We weren't flat but we didn't have the intensity we had at URI [on Saturday]," Wolf said. "In the second half we had to start working to get a goal and we concentrated on what we do best, which is one and two touch passing and working off the ball."

What solid scoring opportunities the Crusaders did create were thwarted by Wolf, who came up with his fifth career shutout. Wolf said the Crusaders did not take good advantage of their offensive chances. He also said the game was particularly difficult because they were tired from playing Saturday and because they are looking ahead to possibly winning the A-10 championship Friday.

"Holy Cross was definitely threatening, but they didn't finish well and we did," Wolf said. "I'm just glad to get by this game. We showed a lot of heart by playing the way we did today."

CHRIS EVANS / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team continued to roll with a win over Holy Cross 2-0 yesterday.

Massachusetts Coach Sam Koch praised Wolf's effort, but he also said the Minuteman defense did a great job of making his job as easy as possible.

Koch said he was extremely pleased with the way the Minutemen played because of the difficult circumstances.

"This was a game that Holy Cross needed to win. In order to get respect for their program they needed to beat us today," he said. "It was very hard for us to be ready to play this game but the kids were ready to play from the start. I am very pleased with how well we played."

Men's soccer looks to overseas starters Bremke and Giahi

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Neither Karsten Bremke nor Hossein Giahi was on the field when the final horn sounded of yesterday's 2-0 win over Holy Cross at Garber Field.

No matter, the two well-traveled members of the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team had already done their share to earn this win for the Minutemen. Bremke scored his team-high seventh goal at the 55:11 mark, and Giahi assisted both goals. (Senior co-captain Mike Doyle was the recipient of Giahi's second assist at 58:44.)

UMass is not the first nor the most prominent program to use foreign-born players to its advantage. The United States' World Cup roster included Dutch striker Ernie Stewart, South African forward Roy Wegerle and German midfielder Thomas Dooley.

But those international veterans were expected to bolster their side's prospects. No one anticipated that Bremke (Marienfeld, Germany), originally slotted in the UMass defense, would become its top scorer, or that Giahi (Tehran, Iran), who played just four games last year after playing 14 in 1992, would peak as the post-season draws near.

"It feels so good," Giahi said of his renewed playing time. "I owe a lot to the coaching staff. [Assistant coach] Steve [Rammel] has helped me so much."

"[Hossein's] done everything we've asked," coach Sam Koch said. "He deserves everything he's got. He's creative, he's moving the ball well, and he's passing well, which he wasn't doing earlier."

The men's soccer media guide describes Giahi as the "best dribbler on the team." The 26-year-old senior honed his ballhandling skills during many years playing indoor soccer, where ball control is at a premium. But the adjustment from turf to natural surface was difficult for Giahi.

"Outdoor is tougher, you have to fight more for the ball, but indoor relies more on skill," Giahi said.

Giahi also gained valuable experience playing with Lusatano, a Portuguese semi-professional team, and for club teams in Iran.

Bremke also learned the game in his homeland, a legendary soccer nation, playing two seasons for the reserve squad of Borussia Dortmund, one of

Options for labor stuggles, hockey, and UM-Lowell

It's a sad day when sports talk shows spend more time using words like "cap," "lockout" and "mediation" than they do wins and losses and balls and strikes, but that is the sports world in 1994.

With labor struggles dominating the headlines, some compromise must be reached.

Here are two suggestions that the players and management might consider in their negotiations.

Rookie salary cap: The NFL got it right when they implemented this policy. The money for players who are just starting is astronomical. There is no way to tell whether or not a player will successfully make the transition from college to the pro game. After a year the contracts would be reworked with a better idea of the players' potential as a pro.

The fact that players like Acie Earl can be multi-millionaires is proof that the system is flawed.

A rookie salary cap would also be effective in keeping the players in college because the lure of enormous contracts would be removed.

Veteran exception: One of the major complaints filed against the salary cap is that in order to get under the cap, teams are forcing their veterans to take pay cuts or just cutting them outright.

Players like Phil Simms, who clearly still have enough skills to play in the NFL, are finding themselves working as television analysts instead of on the playing field.

These moves hurt the game. They create animosity between the veterans and younger players and destroy any loyalty between teams and players. They also water down the game, giving cheaper, less talented players jobs while more talented athletes are unemployed because of their price tag.

Creating a veteran exemption for players with eight years league experience and five years with the same team would reduce the problem considerably. Teams could keep the veterans who have been with them for an extended time without having to keep them under the salary cap.

If those same veterans want to test the free agent market, a la Rickey Jackson or Richard Dent, then they would lose their exemption and their salaries would count toward the cap like anyone else's.

The NHLPA promised not to strike if Gary Bettman agreed to start the season on time and negotiations would continue while games were being played.

Bettman had said all along that the reason for the postponement (lockout) was that he did not want to start a season that might be halted by a strike. When the players called his bluff and renounced their right to strike, Bettman came away looking like a liar.

A report from the Quebec Nordiques has the team losing $8 million if the season is played and $12 million if they remain locked out, because of the current economic structure of the league. Assuming that every team's books are relatively similar, it appears that everyone (players, owners and fans) are better off if they play the games and negotiate concurrently than not playing. Do the math.

Natalie Hart key to UM field hockey success

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Speak softly and carry a big stick.

For the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, that big stick belongs to senior sweeper Natalie Hart, who has been one of the most valuable parts of both the offense and the defense for the Minutewomen.

At 6-foot-2, the London, England native is impossible to ignore. Her trademark penalty corner blasts and excellent defensive skills have become synonymous with UMass field hockey to players and coaches around the nation.

"When people around the country think of UMass, they think of Nat," said Massachusetts Coach Megan Donnelly.

After being eliminated by UMass in the first round of the NCAA tournament, Boston University Coach Sally Starr talked about Hart's talents.

"Natalie Hart eats up so much territory," Starr said. "UMass is unique in that style of play. I've been coaching 14 years now and I've never seen a player dominate a game in that manner. It's just so hard to defend."

The UMass penalty corner holds no surprises. They are going to try to get the ball to Hart and unleash her cannon. Opponents know it is coming, but few know how to stop it.

"If she rips off a good one, even if it doesn't go in, you've got the goalie nervous," Donnelly said. "Then you can do whatever you want. It's such a great offensive weapon. You know it's coming, stop it if you can."

"[Scoring] really takes pressure off the team," Hart said, "and I really want to do that. I like the pressure. I have very high expectations for myself."

In three seasons at UMass, Hart has 34 goals and 76 points good for sixth and eighth on the all-time leaders at UMass.

Some casual observers make the mistake of thinking that all of Hart's skills come from her size, and that is clearly not the case. She is deceptively quick and a very talented passer.

"It does aggravate me that people look at my size and say 'she's really big,' because that's only part of my game," Hart said. "I know I can hit the ball really hard, but I also like making the little passes."

While it is easy to focus on Hart's offensive numbers, the fact is she is a key part of the Minutewoman defense.

"The key is to not let people attack down the middle," Donnelly said. "With Natalie's quickness and tackling ability, we're really able to keep people out of the middle, which is a key reason to the success we've had."

Hart has become adept at squelching opponents' offensive attacks. One quick swing of her stick and the ball is traveling quickly down the field out of harm's way.

"I have a lot of pride in being a defender," Hart said. "Anyone who played at UMass past or present has a lot of pride in that."

Donnelly describes her sweeper as a total package.

"She has the size and therefore the reach," Donnelly said. "She has the strength, the big hit, and she has the quickness. It's rare. She has all those

Women's cross country takes 2nd place at New Englands

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team once again placed at the front of the pack as they finished second in the New England Championship held Saturday at Boston's Franklin Park.

Melissa Langevin set the pace for the Minutewomen, finishing second in a field of 203 runners with a time of 17:58. Langevin was awarded her third Atlantic 10 runner of the week award for her efforts.

UMass (91 points) finished behind only Boston University (75 points) and narrowly ahead of rival Connecticut (102 points). The Minutewomen are currently second in the Atlantic 10 and fourth in the New England regional poll.

"I'm very excited about it," UMass Coach Julie LaFreniere said. "It was an outstanding race. They ran as hard as they could."

The victory over the Huskies came courtesy of the efforts of Rebecca Donaghue and Julie Moreau. Both Moreau and Donaghue caught UConn runners at the finish line after a frantic final quarter mile. Their extra points made the difference between UMass placing second overall as opposed to third.

Donaghue, who placed eighth overall and second for the Minutewomen, was rewarded by being named the A-10's rookie of the week for the third time this season. She was also the first freshman to finish the race.

Donaghue has consistently placed second for UMass and will be a valuable asset as the team gears up for its two biggest races, the upcoming A-10s and ECACs.

"I'm very excited about it," UMass Coach Julie LaFreniere said. "They ran as hard as they could."

"I think everyone did well but there's still a lot left with them," LaFreniere said. "They ran as hard as they could, but our best race will be at the ECACs."

Saturday the Minutewomen will face a challenge as they venture to Morgantown, W.Va., for the A-10 Championships.

Host West Virginia has the strongest team along with the home course advantage working in their favor. Meanwhile, a tough St. Joseph's squad will challenge UMass. The Hawks were defeated by the Minutewomen earlier this season, but St. Joseph's ran without their top runner, who is expected to compete at the conference championships Saturday.

"It'll be a dogfight for second," LaFreniere said. "St. Joseph's is going to be tough, but we've got a shot at it. It's got to be a total team effort, but anything can happen in cross country."

Strong races from sophomore Kristin Donaldson and freshman Kirsten Bringardner could push the Minutewomen past the Hawks. Depth is often a problem in cross country and the Minutewomen need to utilize theirs.

BU coach Bruce Lehane commented after the New Englands that a lack of depth has hurt his team despite a pair of victories over UMass this season and a number three regional ranking.

"Our girls in the back ran well enough to squeak this meet out, but if we want to go to the Nationals this year we've got to improve those back couple of girls to close up the gap," he said.

LaFreniere said she feels that if their current rate of improvement continues and her runners continue their strong performances, anything is possible at both the A-10s and ECACs.

"Right now, we're right on target and I feel confident that we can go into West Virginia on Saturday and run an even better race (than at the New Englands)," she said. "If Langevin can win Runner of the Year and Donaghue wins Rookie of the Year, then I think that we've definitely got a shot at winning Team of the Year."

Words fly as Weld strikes back in second debate with Roosevelt

Weld is aggressive in final installment of televised debates

By Jonathan Yenkin
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld, who took a verbal pounding in his first debate with Democratic rival Mark Roosevelt, struck back in their second encounter Wednesday, attacking his opponent's voting record on taxes and crime.

Weld repeatedly tried to link Roosevelt with policies that sent the state into deep deficits before the governor took office in 1991.

But Roosevelt, a state representative from Boston, accused Weld of dwelling on the past and running away from his own record of failing to rebuild the state's manufacturing base.

"You've come here tonight to debate the past. You've come here to debate Michael Dukakis," Roosevelt said, referring to Weld's predecessor in the governor's office.

"I'm debating you on your record," Weld responded.

"I would invite everyone to remember how bad the state was (several years ago) and who got us there," he said.

The televised debate was the final face-to-face matchup between the candidates before the Nov. 8 election.

Roosevelt, whose campaign gained a bit of momentum after his aggressive performance in the first debate last week, needed another strong effort and a big surge of support in order to catch Weld.

Weld, seeking his second term, maintained a 2-to-1 lead in a recent public opinion poll despite refusing to hit back at Roosevelt in the first debate.

But Weld was clearly more aggressive from the start of Wednesday's debate. He repeatedly recited Roosevelt's votes for higher taxes, against tax cuts and against anti-crime measures. "He's fought me every step of the way," Weld said, referring to his own attempts to cut taxes. "He's been on the other side of the tax issue on every vote of his life."

Roosevelt repeatedly struck back at Weld. He said the governor hasn't lived up to his tough rhetoric on crime, noting that Weld pledged to take away televisions from prisoners and now they have cable TV.

"I think you should be embarrassed with yourself the way you play on people's fears," Roosevelt said.

Roosevelt also criticized Massachusetts for allowing the state's manufacturing base to continue to erode. But Weld noted the state's unemployment rate has fallen to the second-lowest level among the big industrial states.

"You don't win them all," Weld said. "But we're winning more than we're losing."

Roosevelt also renewed his attack on Weld for his support of bringing casino gambling to Massachusetts. Roosevelt pointed to Weld's previous opposition to casinos and suggested the governor has flipped his position because he has close political allies with ties to the gambling industry.

"Where special interests go, you have gone repeatedly in your governorship," Roosevelt said.

But Weld accused Roosevelt of displaying a "paternalistic" attitude for opposing a proposed Indian-owned casino in the economically depressed city of New Bedford.

"You don't want them to have a job because you're afraid they're going to gamble a buck," Weld said.

RSO funding cuts could scrap events and derail projects

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

Cutbacks in the budgets of all Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) at the University of Massachusetts may cause the "Prison Awareness Week Project" to lose several of its events and key speakers.

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted not to approve a motion to allocate $3000 from Finance Reserves to the account of the Alliance for Student Empowerment (ASP), for the purpose of funding the series of events during "Prison Awareness Week."

The Prison Awareness Week Project, which is scheduled from November 12–19, plans to bring events and speakers to campus which deal with the criminal justice system, political prisoners and the conditions of prisons in the United States and in other countries.

Because ASP, which is one of the sponsors of the Awareness Week, did not get the $3000 needed, some of the events scheduled might be cancelled, according to Charles Lenchner, member of the ASP.

"If we do not get the money for the Prison Awareness Week Project, we will have to cancel a better half of the week," Lenchner said.

Marc Cappelleni, chair of the finance committee, debated against the motion, saying that the amount of money the ASP asked for is simply too much.

"The position which I hold is the position that I am responsible for all the RSOs on campus," Cappelleni said. "The finance committee only has $10,500 to work with for the semester, for 25 RSOs."

"There have been eight groups which have petitioned me for money in the last three days," Cappelleni said. "With the amount of money I have to work with I cannot give more than $500 to $600 to each RSO."

Ruth Malkin, chair of the Ways and Means Committee, said it is the result of the cutbacks to all the RSO budgets.

"We really want to help the ASP out," Malkin said, "but it is simply a question of affordability."

The finance committee had $30,000 in its budget to allocate to RSOs for the 1993–94 school year, according to Malkin. For this school year, 1994–95, the committee has $22,500, a decrease of $7,500.

"And we will be getting even more petitions this year than last year, because all the RSOs received cutbacks in their budgets," Malkin said.

The ASP can re-petition the finance committee for up to $750, without having to bring it to the Senate for vote, according to Cappellini.

"Just because the motion failed doesn't mean [the] ASP can't petition for money under the $750 ceiling," said Cappellini.

Women's religious roles discussed

Authors present women's places in Catholic, Jewish traditions

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Feminist authors Esther Broner and Mary Gordon participated in an inter-religious dialogue about women in the Jewish and Catholic traditions entitled "Inside and Outside the Gate," yesterday in the Helen Hills Chapel of Smith College.

The dialogue shifted as each woman took turns discussing the metaphor of the gate, liturgical language, religious role models and the conflict between feminism and religious institutions.

It was explained that inside the gate is religion. Broner described the gate of Judaism as only being "half open," but explained that there is an urgency to get in as well as a desire to get out.

Gordon elaborated more on the metaphor, explaining there are four gates in Catholicism.

Everything inside the gates needs to be protected from the outside world, she said, but "I wanted the world and went crashing through the gates" to get out.

However Gordon said what is inside those gates is something she can't live without.

Gordon also pointed out that the gates of Catholicism are much higher and more guarded than those of Judaism, to which Broner laughingly replied, "the grass is always greener."

Later in the evening the metaphor surfaced with a different implication.

Broner told of her childhood as a Jewish girl living with the "fear of the enemy," who was anyone not Jewish. She asked, "How do you learn to go out into the world? How do you learn not to hate the world you came out of?"

Gordon took the point further by applying the gate metaphor to the separateness of the worlds inside and outside the gate. She asked the question, "Who are we separating ourselves from? Who is the "other" in the context of religious life?"

Gordon spoke about the obsession of the Church to separate people as either inside or outside the gate, while she pointed out that Judaism is a bit more lenient.

Broner and Gordon discussed the complications of being a feminist within Judaism and Catholicism respectively.

They discussed rebelling against the language of religion. Broner explained that she tries to rewrite the script.

She was told that she cannot change "the script," but said "fiction writers and feminists change the script all the time," and will continue to change the script to include

Major fair to help students choose future study paths

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Correspondent

Students in the five college area who have already declared a major or are still undecided now have a chance to "translate majors into careers."

CASIAC (College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center) is sponsoring the first annual University of Massachusetts majors fair which will be open to students from the five colleges.

"Students need to know what is available and how majors lead to careers," said Elizabeth Teagan, co-producer of the event and CASIAC advisor.

The fair, which will be held next Tuesday, will target the 9,700 UMass students enrolled in the Colleges of Arts and Sciences, including those with undeclared majors, pre-majors and those who wish to add or change their major.

The fair is a result of this year's revamping of the CASIAC program. Improvements to the office in general include the hiring of new staff, additional office hours, and the development of the major fair so students may be more informed of what the department has to offer, Teagan said.

"The goals of the majors fair are to bring as many majors possible to one place and help the students learn how to choose a major through academic advising," Teagan said. "We will be helping students translate majors into jobs."

The fair is the week before pre-registration, so students can get a taste of different majors, careers and new choices before they choose their classes, according to Linda Roney, co-producer of the fair and director of CASIAC.

Over 50 majors will be represented. Each major will have a peer advisor, a representative from the major, and a professional academic advisor from CASIAC present, Teagan said.

During the fair, students will be able to declare, change or add a major, Teagan said.

Students will be able to discuss their general education requirements

Peace treaty ends 46 years of fighting

President Clinton attends signing between Israel and Jordan

By Neil MacFarquhar
Associated Press

WADI ARABA, Israel-Jordan Border — It was a simple gesture, charged with the hope of peace, the cost of war.

Two young girls, one Israeli, the other Jordanian, presented bouquets of roses and jasmine to the leaders of both countries, moments before a document ending 46 years of war was signed Wednesday.

Li Lotan, an 8 year-old Israeli in a white dress, and Hiba Smadi, a 14-year-old Jordanian in a long, embroidered Bedouin dress, each had a grandfather killed in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan accepted the bouquets and, in signing the treaty, pledged that future generations of children in both countries won't be deprived as Li and Hiba were.

"The peace that was born today gives us all hope that the children born today will never know war between us and their mothers will know no sorrow," Rabin said.

Fittingly, the state of war between Israel and Jordan ended in a setting both festive and somber. On a scorching desert plain, only recently a minefield, Hussein and Rabin came together with President Clinton and 5,000 spectators.

Thousands of balloons, mingling the colors of the Israeli, Jordanian and American flags, soared overhead. Artillery that Jordanians and Israelis had once trained on each other fired skyward in celebration.

Hussein said the peace treaty "will be real. ... No more deaths, no more misery, no more suspicion, no more fear, no more uncertainty."

Clinton warned Arab hard-liners not to turn to bloodshed "in their zeal to kill hope and keep hatred alive."

"We cannot, we must not, we will not let them succeed," he declared. His presence generated the most excitement, with teen-agers from both sides jumping in the crowd for a better view. Shortly before the ceremony, guerrillas of the Iranian-backed Hezbollah fired rockets into northern Israel in an apparent gesture of disapproval of the colorful ceremony near the Red Sea.

Clinton, who started a six-nation tour of the Middle East on Wednesday, is to go to the Syrian capital Thursday in an effort to draw President Hafez Assad back into the stalled Israeli-Syrian peace talks.

Hussein, Rabin and Clinton paid homage to all the fallen of the Arab-Israeli wars, observing a minute of silence for the war dead. "I believe they are with us on this occasion and at this time as we come together to ensure, God willing, that there will be no more death," Hussein said.

The audience included Israeli and Jordanian war veterans. Shmuel Amran, 47, lost his left leg during an artillery duel in 1968 when he was an Israeli soldier chasing Arab infiltrators in the Jordan Valley.

He posed happily on crutches with members of the Jordanian army band.

"For my whole life there has been a closed border between Israel and Jordan. We always saw them from a distance. Now I'm among them. It is a very special day for me," Amran said.

The hour-long ceremony began with the army bands from Israel and Jordan playing their national anthems, then a joint rendition of America's "Star-Spangled Banner."

Queer community brings challenges to Right-wing

By Stephen C. Campbell
Collegian Staff

Sue Hyde, the coordinator of the Fight the Right Project for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, spoke in a discussion yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center at the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Brown Bag Series.

The discussion entitled "Why Does the Right-Wing Hate Homosexuality?" was presented by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

Hyde's discussion centered on the groups of people called the Right, also known as the Religious Right and Right-wing extremists, and what could be behind their thinking for hating homosexuality.

"Other issues are anti-abortion, anti-government, anti-tax, anti-feminist at its core, anti-immigration, anti-civil rights, anti-environment, anti-multicultural and at its core anti-Semitic," Hyde said. "In order to support and raise their own religion they need to denigrate others."

"Why do they hate us? Why is this way of living and loving of special interest to them," Hyde asked.

Hyde asked the people attending the discussion to list some terms that have been used to describe members of the queer community. Some of the terms were pervert, promiscuous, unnatural, immoral, abnormal, anti-family and unAmerican.

"Why are we these things?" Hyde said, who also said that these terms are connected to the belief the Right holds in the hierarchy of Natural Law decreed by God. According to Hyde, this belief is "that God has dominion over man, meaning men not mankind, who has dominion over women, children and nature."

Hyde said that the Right sees people in the queer community as challenging what they view as natural, normal relationships and family structures, and their morality.

"Gay men and women challenge ideas of masculinity. Straight men have a hard time dealing with the thought of being sexual objects. There are women in this world who couldn't care less about a straight man," Hyde said. "Anti- gay matters get down to personal issues like these."

According to Hyde, the Right which is about 97 percent White and mostly men, view the civil rights that queer people are fighting for, like equal access to work and housing, as special rights. Many of those on the right see issues like affirmative action as special rights as well.

"The anti-gay agenda that the Right has is just an appetizer for a bigger meal," Hyde said.

"We need to know what's behind the rhetoric of heterosexual supremacy. We can't combat it unless we understand the thinking of the group, and we can't understand the group unless we understand the individual," Hyde said.

WOMEN making WAVES

Compiled By Erin Barnes

Farewell, frivolity hello spiritual life

From socialite to sister, millionaire Anne Russel gave up her fortune to become a nun at the age of 65. The widowed wife of former Pacific Gas and Electric Gas President Richard Miller, made a vow with her husband that the person who survived the other would dedicate his or her life to God.

Staying true to her word, Russel arranged a giant garage sale for those items her children did not claim, and donated the proceeds to charity. Afterward, she threw a black tie gala for 800 of her closest friends, where she bid farewell before departing to Carmelite Monastery in Des Plaines, Ill.

Happy with her decision, Mrs. Russell claims that "the first two-thirds of my life were devoted to the world. The last third will be devoted to my soul."

Survey reveals job dissatisfaction

In a recent survey designed by the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor, many of the 250,000 women who responded find their work challenging, but half see little of no opportunity for advancement at their current positions.

Karen Nussbaum, director of the Bureau, said that her agency was surprised at the number of women who reported unequal pay for doing the same work as male co- workers.

Thirty four percent of those respondents claim that they are not paid what their job is worth, 31 percent say there is too much stress, and 20 percent need better benefits. Nussbaum concurs that the myth still exists that women don't need to earn as much as men.

Alexander finishes pilgrimage for art

By the end of this December, Jane Alexander, director of the National Endowment of the Arts, will have fulfilled her pilgrimage for the arts in all 50 states. Her travels are designed to educate herself on each area's special concerns and to proclaim her message that "a time of renewal" has arrived, and that the arts must play a crucial role in our communities, our schools, and our individual lives.

Maryland cops send harassment complaints to top

Kudos to state troopers and other workers in Jessup, Md., who are now required to make sexual harassment complaints directly to the head of the department.

Previously, complaints went through the normal chain of command and critics say they were poorly investigated. This is certainly a step in the right direction.

She said. . .

women until "history fits the script."

Broner spoke of her desire to revise the traditional religious liturgy to include women in the language and history of Judaism. She illustrated this by reading from her book The Women's Haggadah, a prayer book for the Jewish holiday of Passover with a feminist perspective.

Gordon said she has little hope to change the Catholic language, and admits the inconsistency of being a feminist and holding on to traditional liturgy. She calls herself a "liturgical conservative and political leftist."

Broner spoke of the need to see the importance of Jewish women throughout history. She said she never had a role model comparable to a nun as a Jewish girl. "There was no womanly, maternal figure I could look to. I had to become my own mother."

Gordon told a story about the nuns she saw growing up. She said she respects the image of a woman as a religious being, but acknowledged her father as her spiritual advisor.

At a reception after the dialogue, Broner said the only way to accept the change of feminist language in Judaism is with "familiarity and repetition."

Gordon said the practices of the Church cause her to be angry, but she uses that anger to create change. She said, "I don't know how (to change) but I know I cannot be silent."

How, if at all, do you feel the basketball team at the University of Massachusetts exploits Black athletes?

Compiled By Tim White • Photos By Steve Pedulla

"I think it exploits athletes in general. I really don't see a difference in treatment between Blacks, Hispanics and Whites on the team. I think UMass has a quality program now and they are trying to shoot down the big guys."

— CHARLES STONE
sophomore, chemistry
Gardner

"I don't because they choose to be on the team — it's their choice. I think that even if they were all White, if your a really good team, they're going to exploit you if your Black or White."

— NICOLE BAILY
freshman, undecided
Mountainside, N.J.

"I think it's sort of a give and take — the athletes are here for a reason, and the University has them here for a reason. They work, maybe, for the University, but that is an outcome for all sports. The starting five is likely to go on and have a pro career; they get something out of it. Maybe you should ask the 12th player."

— CRAIG SUTTON
graduate student, mathematics
Norwalk, Conn.

"If it gives people a chance to go to school, then I don't see anything wrong with it. If they're getting an education, then they're not getting used. If they're not getting an education then they are getting used. It doesn't make a difference if you're Black or White."

— WOJO GROCHOWSKI
Junior, history
Belchertown

"It's hard, [athletes] have a lot of pressures that regular students don't have, and I don't know the kind of support, like tutoring, they get. I'm kind of concerned. It's the responsibility of the University to help the students. They need to provide the services."

— EMILY BIBBINS
senior, sociology and African American studies
Boston

"I think a lot of times students in general are exploited. The University uses them for four years and they don't go to the pros, so they have to go back to school anyway. If they let the students slide, then it hurts them regardless of race. To me it's a personal thing, if they don't mind playing for the team, then it's okay."

— TARA DIXON
junior, history and comparative literature

"I don't think they're getting exploited. They're giving the school their talent, and they're also getting an education. Schools go out of their way to go recruit them. They want the best player for their school."

— VA LIP
junior, undecided
Easthampton

Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

Opinion/Editorial

Small groups need funding

University of Massachusetts. September 26, 1984.

After an hour of debate, the Undergraduate Student Senate votes to retain funding for the People's Gay Alliance, the Lesbian Union and the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Counseling Collective.

Sylvan area vice-president and SGA budget committee member Michael Oduro had sponsored a motion that would have cut off Student Activities Trust Fund money to "sexual preference groups." According to Oduro and fellow budget committee member Alfred Loomer, "the supporting members believe that sexual preference groups do not represent the general student population."

Reaction within the University community is strong. The Collegian is flooded with letters and editorials from GLBT groups and local individuals. In addition to front page coverage, the paper runs a lengthy unsigned editorial condemning action in the SGA as "insulting to us all."

Ten years later, the scenario above seems almost unthinkable here at UMass.

Back in 1984, certain people at the University decided that the only activities and groups worth funding were those that served wide portions of the student community. Groups based on religion, athletics, academics, residential areas or sexual orientation were seen as catering to small numbers of individuals.

"Why don't we use the SATF money for university-wide purposes rather than for those who represent a very small part of this campus," Oduro asked.

His question is still relevant today, of course.

Why should the SGA support groups of individuals which, in terms of sheer numbers, do not seem to represent the wider UMass community? Judging from the number of students in the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance, for instance, it would seem that the SGA is wasting money on a very small minority. Why do they continue funding?

The answer is simple. Groups like the LBGA have been formed because students felt a need to form them. Many gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender students feel that there are no activities or support groups accommodating to their specific needs and interests. Without the LBGA, queer students may encounter homophobia and loneliness when facing the larger student population.

Many queer students do without the LBGA, but there is also a group that has decided to band together. They do this for many reasons — for protection, for visibility, for friendship. They band together to show the rest of the community they exist and to inspire other queers to come out of the closet.

Without funding from the SGA, groups like the LBGA would die. Members of the GLBT minority would be overpowered by the forces of the larger UMass community. No longer could they speak out as a group against homophobia or heterosexism on campus. No longer would they have a place to go to discuss their concerns and share their experiences. No longer could they go to dances where they wouldn't be stared at or made to feel alone.

Queers across campus would be forced to suffer in silence in even greater numbers than today. Many would have trouble finding each other. First year students would arrive at UMass with nowhere to go with their bottled-up feelings, nowhere to meet their long-lost friends.

Wendy Darling

Michael Oduro, the SGA committee member who wanted to bar funding, was African American. Even back in 1984, he probably had black student groups supporting him here at the University. They gave him someplace to go for support and advocated for the special needs of his community. They educated the larger student population and sponsored events and concerts that might not have had "campus-wide" support.

Was SGA money too good for these groups?

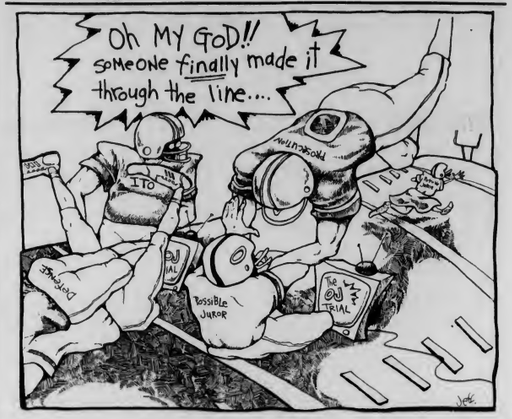
Perhaps some would argue that groups based on race or ethnicity are different from groups like the LBGA. After all, the presence of African Americans, Asians, Latinos and other minority students is documented and obvious.

When it comes to queer people, however, numbers are harder to come by. Thousands of students are in the closet, some to themselves, hiding their sexual orientation in order to make friends, to achieve success, to avoid the harassment and homophobia regularly aimed at queers who come out. Even those who are out of the closet are sometimes hard to recognize. What does a real queer look like? Most people think they know, but they don't. Most queer people are invisible.

Groups like the LBGA make sure that queer students get seen and get the chance to enjoy UMass just as much as other students — in 1984, and today.

Wendy Darling is a Collegian staff member.



The strengthening of family bonds

Pulitzer prize-winning columnist Anne Quindlen writes in Thinking Out Loud that "one of the most mysterious things for many children is the question of how their parents feel about things, about sex and love and drugs and bigotry — not broad outlines of their positions, but the nuance, the thought process, the history, and the background." She continues to say that "it takes most kids a long time — until they are adults really — to figure out who their parents are aside from their positions as personal adjuncts."

Now that I have finally reached adulthood, I feel quite confident about who my parents are, as well as those issues in which they passionately believe. But, as a student who lives and works over 2,000 miles away from home, I have wondered to what extent my parents really know and understand me.

I remember when I was younger, I used to think that my parents were prying if they asked me how I was doing. Now, I welcome that same question. Despite my previously held hesitations towards my parents and their incessant curiosity, I want very much for them to be involved in these four years of my life. This week, my prayers were answered.

You may have, by chance, seen an extremely attractive 51- year-old woman walking on campus (she happens to look a lot like me). Well, that's my mom, visiting from our home in Colorado. So far, we are having a great time, and though my senior picture that graces her desk at work does provide for her a flitting, albeit stunning, image of me, I am enjoying the fact that she is finally seeing me in my true element. In addition, I believe that she sees in me a great deal of herself as a college coed 30 years ago. A lot has indeed changed, but a lot has remained the same.

My mother admits that she sees many of the same characteristics between today's college students and those from her day. Both groups feel as though we could successfully take on the world, although my mother's generation challenged traditional systemic institutions out of necessity, not out of convenience; a sad fact with which our generation seems eternally plagued. Where they fought for the termination of racism and sexism (both issues of timeless importance), our generation seems to be grasping at any social problems in which to dispute (you need not look any further than last year's crusade to change the name of this University's mascot for proof of this fact).

It is also ironic that each generation had their own Woodstock, although the original festival was about peace and music, rather than a commercialized replica of an event that could never be adequately reproduced.

Regardless of these criticisms, both my mother and I witness(ed) two generations that do feel passionate towards our respective causes, no matter how silly they may appear at the time. Ultimately, the apparent generation-gap theory (read: scapegoat) exists only in our minds, and we can follow the example set by our parents if we elect to do so. I only hope that in 30 years, I will get the opportunity to see my daughter in her elemeitt, and I hope to be able to share my thoughts and admiration with my mother when that moment arrives. I am very lucky to have two people in my life that take such an active interest, and I'll be the first to admit that I overlooked this fact during those infamous "know-it-all" adolescent years. It's funny — the older I get, the more intelligent my parents become.

Admitting the roots of human urges

The conversation began innocently with the oft-pondered question of why thinness in women is generally regarded as a sexually attractive trait. We concurred in our sentiment that media images were largely responsible for determining what each generation considers appealing. She pointed out that in previous decades, the robustly curvaceous beauty of Marilyn Monroe represented the standard of feminine perfection.

Thomas Akyali

"It's the same reason guys like girls with big boobs," she added casually.

"That's really more of an evolutionary preference," I objected.

She stared at me perplexed. I answered her next question without pause.

"Millions of years ago, males who preferred females with larger mammary glands probably had more offspring survive to maturity, over a long time. Just because the female neanderthal or whatever could feed more children."

"And. . ."

"Well, Darwinian theory shows how such a preference might propagate throughout society, once again over time."

"So when you see a chick who's really stacked you're thinking 'look at those mammaries, I bet she could support plenty of offspring!'?"

"You know what I'd be thinking."

Everybody likes to believe that we control our desires and our actions. We understand hormones and lust, but we also believe that we choose our mates and coordinate our actions according to a logical decision making process.

What is so often blurred in our egotism of humanity and intelligence is the possibility that many of our actions and choices are subconsciously predetermined. We party on weekends because it's fun, but why is it fun? To an extent, our being understands how the possibility of "hooking up" is increased in a social setting. Thus the deepest recesses of our minds, the part passed down over aeons, encourages us to engage is such behavior. Conversely, the same part of our mind disapproves of studying at home on a Saturday night.

By acknowledging the effects of instinct and emotion in our behavior we come closer to true spirituality. What separates us from lower creatures is the ability to determine consequences and not be led solely by impulse. Too often however, we fail to make the necessary mental exertion, and remain content to do what comes most naturally, acting under the irresponsible shield of "because I want to," and "that's what I like."

Logical decision making ability is the most unique trait of humanity. Why then is it so difficult to resist sexual affairs and weeknight drinking binges, impulsive behaviors by which we ruin our relationships and derail our academic pursuits? When we let our guard down, when we succumb to doing what comes most easily, is when we lower ourselves to the realm of the animal.

As Meursealt in Camus' Stranger faces execution, he is asked to embrace Christianity, to seek redemption via the Lord. Meursealt chooses, however, to accept his impending death for what it is, the end of existence both physically as well as spiritually. He has no need to imagine for himself an afterlife, he puts no value on his existence as a soul or a spirit. Meursealt's humility in the face of death, his acceptance of his existence as a simple creature, is the ultimate manifestation of his humanity.

We cannot expect to defy our instinct altogether. Lust remains lust, and we will forever be going to parties in search of sex. We must learn that such behaviors are ultimately subconscious, and that there will always exist a certain irrational element to these actions.

Only through humility in the face of nature can we reach the spirituality that lurks in our minds. By embracing our instincts we can learn to defy them. And when we can defy the urges of heredity, when we modify our actions to be logical and productive, we are most human.

Notes from the Basement

With the construction near the Campus Center parking garage, plan on leaving your house 45 minutes early if you want to park there. The road leading up to the garage is closed and a detour has been set up down a one-way street.

As you go four-wheeling across campus, past the engineering buildings, be sure and look out for pedestrians. They walk along the same paths you'll find yourself merrily careening down. Be sure and stay within the carefully marked detour. You might find yourself driving past the Bartlett if you're not careful.

Come to think of it, parking at the metered spots near Boyden Gym is no easy task either. Driving through that lot is like shopping at the supermarket on a double coupon Saturday. It's ruthless. People camp out overnight to park in those spots.

You would think that with all the land this campus owns, and all the people it employs, and all the commuter students it educates, that there would be a more logical parking situation on this campus. But, no.

You know, they employ people just to walk around and hand out tickets to people parked in illegal spots. Where do the ticket people park? Is it anywhere near the building they work in, because it seems as though no other parking lots are near buildings.

******

Project Pulse called me the other night. The woman started off with "you've been randomly selected to participate in a Project Pulse survey." Stop right there. That's a crock if I've ever heard one.

This is the second time in two weeks that Project Pulse has called me. Last semester they called me three times in three weeks and hit someone else I know the same three nights. Last week they even had the nerve to call me at work. Random, my ass.

Why do they do these surveys? All that ever comes of it is a nicely typed result sheet on funky colored paper. Changes are never made.

The latest survey was about the quality of the parking situation and the Campus Center / Student Union complex. These people are focusing on such important topics. The hottest question was "Do you think there should be pizza parties in the Hatch?"

******

I still don't understand why there are only two automatic teller machines in the Campus Center. The University of Massachusetts is the largest university in this state and we only have four available cash withdrawal places. Yeah, I know they have them at the Newman Center, but technically that is not on campus.

There should be a wall of machines available in the Campus Center Basement. It's not like the room isn't available. Take out some of those meeting rooms — which aren't all filled, all the time — and put in ATMs.

******

Just recently, I visited the campus of Northeastern University in Boston. The Student Union had all outside businesses, like Burger King, Pizza Hut and a deli.

The floors were rugged and the chairs were comfortable. People were studying and it was quiet and nice.

Plus they had the system where they had money set up as a food credit and could use their student i.d. instead of cash.

Gee, and we had Taco Bell. The problem with the food services on campus is that they all serve the same food. Grilled cheese, anyone? It all tastes the same, looks the same and smells the same. And none of it tastes very good.

Someday, maybe instead of taking dumb telephone surveys, administrators will visit other campuses and see how other students are treated. Maybe then we'll see changes. . .

Naaah.

Letters to the Editor

Paper frames questions badly

To the editor:

As a fellow college journalist, two items in the Collegian (Oct. 21) disturbed me. First, as any journalist ought to know, the way a question is framed greatly affects the response. By asking for students' opinions on the "mudslinging" in the Kennedy-Romney race, the responders were faced with an already biased question. Perhaps if you had chosen to ask for student impressions of the Kennedy- Romney race, you might have received less homogenous and more balanced responses.

Secondly, I took issue with the thesis of the columns by David K. Chan and Jim Ganley, that the true issue in the recent Globe articles on the poor academic records of UMass basketball players is how the Globe obtained the students' records. While I agree that the suggestion is that an individual violated confidentiality in releasing student information to a newspaper is certainly something to be investigated, the true issue, nevertheless, remains the shoddy academic showings of these players. What sort of message does this send about the mission of the University — is its primary focus on quality education or winning basketball games?

Why the fine art of pinball is making a comeback

TiLT!

By Tara MK Connelly and Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Your eyes fixate on the ball, watching as it ricochets through the bumpers and goes hurling down the side. You quickly glance up to see that your score has grown and is only points away from replay. Concentrating, you watch as the ball comes zipping down towards your flippers, just as your sweaty fingers hit the side buttons.

Contact! The ball bounces off the right flipper and heads straight for the left ramp. If you hit it — jackpot. If you miss it, that's the end. Thanks to a combination of steady hands and eyes (and dash of luck) the ball hits its destination. Lights flash, sirens roar and REPLAY flashes across the screen as a smile spreads across your face.

The game is pinball, but don't worry — this is not your parents' game. This is pinball 1994 and there's a whole new set of rules.

The old stand-bys of yesteryear such as Fire and Funhouse, when the only object was to see how many times you could shoot the ramps, seem almost cute now by comparison.

"No one knows how to maintain the old games," said Alex Bellia, a senior philosophy major. "I think a lot of the new ones are better, they aren't broken, and there's more action."

Action seems to be the key word. Today's faster and louder games have more to with voice processing and video screen dynamics as they do with making sure you don't tilt.

But in an age where video game systems such as Sega and Nintendo can bring all the excitement and graphic imagery of today's hottest arcade games straight into your home, how can a dinosaur such as pinball survive?

The answer is simple: take the standard principles and strategies of the past and coat them with the high concepts of today's technology. Just take a glance at the row of pinball games at your local arcade. Indiana Jones, Guns 'n' Roses and Star Trek: The Next Generation are games with marketable gimmicks as well as complex and flashy components.

What does pinball have that the others don't? How about variety? Pinball machines can't be reprogrammed, paused or saved. Two quarters, three balls, period. There are no codes needed to display secret hiding places, nothing to automatically line you up with a shot. Everything is timing, reaction and luck. And it's never the same game twice. You're never the same fighter, driver or superhero with the same old restricted and frustrating limitations. It's entertainment at its most basic level and people love it.

"I think it's more of an artistic game," Bellia said. "It's not the beat-each-other-up thing you see in video games today."

And while this new and improved pinball has caused a surge in its popularity, the game has been around a lot longer than one might guess. In fact, it wasn't until the 1940s that pinball gained most of the features associated with modern machines. It soon developed over the years with technology to become a national pastime.

Pinball gained most of it's notoriety in the '50s.

"The machines pay off in something mightier than cash — a chance to Beat the System, do a little harmless cheating, work off your aggression, and make the world behave," wrote Harper's magazine in their October 1957 issue.

Back then, the "stress bender" cost a cool nickel to play, yet the rewards from the game were the same. The winner received only the privilege of playing one or more games for free. It's the snap of the replay, the pinging of the multi- balls, and the slapping of the flippers that gives pinball that physical edge. It's hands on and all skill, baby.

It is also very addictive. Ask any of the players that go to the Campus Center arcade with a week's worth of laundry money clutched in their eager hands waiting to conquer the machine of their choice. It's the satisfaction of beating the machine without electronic artifices that draws in the crowd and keeps the games going at 50 cents a pop.

"[Pinball] mixes chance with skill. Sometimes you can waste money. But, I like the effects, sounds and lights," said Megan Whitney, a sophomore art major.

During the '70s pinball made another come back. Bally, the name in the pinball industry increased its sales from

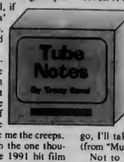
Kennedy v. Romney, round 1

I started this week off watching the political popularity contest (otherwise known as the first senatorial debate) between Massachusetts incumbent Ted Kennedy and the Republican pretty boy of the year Mitt Romney. And I must say, that those make-up guys did a darn good job patching up old Ted's splotchy skin. Still, if Ted ever needed his deceased brothers' good looks, it was Tuesday night. I mean, on television everything shows, and Ted really needed a new head — let's face it.



But young Mitt was slick and self-confident in every way that Ted wasn't, and he was the beauty of the evening. I wouldn't think twice about electing him to be next month's GQ cover-boy. Actually, the whole event just reminded me of some of the uglier aspects of high school — like school spirit and homecoming rallies. Gave me the creeps.

Speaking of creeps, I managed to catch the one thousandth television broadcast of Ghost, the 1991 hit film that had more unintentional laughs in two hours than NBC's "Wings" has in an entire season. My favorite moments come when the black 'repo-spirits' arrive to take away the souls of corrupted villains killed by the sensitive yet vengeful apparition, played by Patrick Swayze. Too bad there aren't a bunch of ghosts who specialize in disposing of bad TV movies. They'd really make a killing.

Which brings me to Carol Burnett's "Men, Movies and Carol," a special that was basically a reprise of the sketch-style comedy seen on the old "Carol Burnett Show" of the 1970s. A couple of the segments were kind of funny, but at times the show cried out for the notably absent talents of former "Burnett Show" collaborators Harvey Korman and Tim Conway.

Guest star Scott Bakula (of "Quantum Leap" fame) just failed to fill the void for me. And I could have done without the part where Carol told guest star crooner Tony Bennett how much she'd lusted after him over the years. I don't want to know about it. I'll never understand why people like that guy, anyway. As far as old-time stars go, I'll take resourceful crime sleuth Angela Lansbury (from "Murder, She Wrote") over Bennett any day.

Not to digress, but I might as well mention that "Dateline NBC" is my new favorite prime-time news show, because they have a "Timeline" — where they tell you a bunch of facts from a particular week in history, and you have to guess what year the facts pertain to. It's

People and Pop Culture in the News

Another Hollywood romance has hit the dirt. Kevin Costner bids a fond adieu to his marriage of 15 years. Apparently he succumbed to lust and his significant other found out (ouch!). You too can catch (ha ha) Kevin and his fine acting abilities in the new movie War, guaranteed to be shorter than his other epic sagas.

Prince Charles recently admitted that he never, ever loved Princess Diana (like we never saw that coming). Not only does this spell divorce, but it could possibly put to question Charlie's right to the throne. Guess he just got tired of Di hogging the spotlight with her X-rated phone calls, suicide attempts, books. . .hey, you'd feel slighted too!

O.J. Simpson just isn't getting any breaks. First his face is plastered on cheesy rubber masks for Halloween (bloody sock prop optional) and then his prison behavior was blemished when a yellow highlighter was found in his cell. This contraband article was supposedly being used so Simpson could highlight books for his lawyers, because you know, the lawyers are so busy preening who has time to do research, and O.J. isn't actually doing anything useful except humming showtunes.

The Bionic Man and Woman have decided to cease living in sin and make their love official. Catch this monumental occasion, Bionic Breakdown, on Nov. 1.

Tori Spelling had a nasty run in with her pet parrot Charlie. Apparently she got a little too close for comfort and the frisky avis exotica chomped on her nose. Seven stitches were needed to fix Spelling. . .I wonder how they are going to work it into the script. "Donna! I had no idea you were behind that door, oh mah god!"

Lisa Marie Presley-Jackson and loving husband Michael have decided to make beautiful music together. She has an Elvis Songbook in the makings and he is crooning to Beatles tunes. Can a duet be far away — for our sakes I hope not.

Another ex-"Dynasty" star has decided to once again try their hand at a television series. Emma Samms (a.k.a. Fallon Colby a.k.a. spokesperson for Pantene Shampoo and conditioners), will join the ranks of "Models Inc." in November.

She will play the long lost wife of Adam Louder (James Wilders) just as he and Monique celebrate their engagement. This could be the boost the show desperately needs.

Slash, Guns 'n' Roses brooding guitarist and modern day messiah (you saw him walk on water in Estranged), has done good. His pinball game Guns 'n' Roses has been breaking records in arcades nationwide. The Slash meister owns 19 games of his own and created the game for kicks.

Editors' Cuts

Soundtrack — Pulp Fiction

It's the number one movie in the country and after listening to the soundtrack, I wouldn't be surprised if the soundtrack is soon to follow. It's music from Pulp Fiction, and it's rarely left the CD player since I bought it.

The soundtrack is a collection of songs that anyone born after 1970 might not have been able to remember when they were first out. "Jungle Boogie" from Kool and The Gang, "Son Of A Preacher Man" by Dusty Springfield and "You Never Can Tell" by Chuck Berry (from the great dance scene) fit right in with the various "surf-style" songs from The Lively Ones, The Tornadoes and The Revels.

Urge Overkill's cover of the Neil Diamond tune "Girl, You'll Be A Woman Soon," and the tranquil droning of "If Love Is A Red Dress (Hang Me In Rags)" by Maria McKee are, by themselves, great songs.

— Mike MacLean

Film — Priscilla

Joni Fraser, the film critic for the Valley Optimist said it best of The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert when she wrote, "Critiquing Priscilla is nearly impossible, like analyzing the nutritional content of cotton candy."

It's a fitting comment for Priscilla, an irreverent and full- of-fun comedy entering its final week at the Academy of Music in Northampton.

Priscilla follows two drag queens and a transsexual (the latter played brilliantly by Superman II-villain Terence Stamp) on their cross-continent tour of the Australian outback. For all of its adult themes, the only baggage you'll find in this film isn't of the emotional variety — more like the gold lame kind.

And while Priscilla ends up undercutting itself by not totally facing up to the issues it encounters, the film does have a wonderfully feel-good tone that's positively infectious.

— Jon Lupo

Music — '80s Nostalgia

Sigh, the '80s. That glorious past decade that we turn a tearful eye to in remembrance . . . OK well maybe not, but there still seems to be a sort of premature nostalgia thing going on here.

And while there has been a definite surge of '80s music compilations, the latest, and easily most definitive collection has hit the shelves. Rhino records (the king daddies of reissuing) have released just can't get enough: NEW WAVE HITS of the '80s, a 10-volume (yes, 10) retrospective of forgotten favorites from the Reagan decade.

Volumes one through five were released earlier this year, containing such vintage numbers as "My Sharona" by The Knack and "Tainted Love" by Soft Cell, as well as lesser knowns as "Love Plus One" by Haircut One Hundred and "Turning Japanese" by The Vapors.

Now, by popular demand, Volumes six through 10 have graced the shelves of record stores across the country everywhere. And while we won't reveal what these six golden platters hold in store — word is it's hot!

8,000 to 36,000 units. Sales were attributed to popular usage in movies like Tommy and the fact that Hugh Hefner kept 24 pinball machines in his infamous Playboy mansion. It was during this time that pinball crossed over from being the punk in the diner's game and moved into the realm of the adult world.

So why did video games begin to emerge if pinball was the end all and be all of indoor entertainment? Easy. the computer was invented and with it the birth of instantaneous gratification.

Atari, the founding father of video games, first began as a pinball contender back in the '70s. They realized the number of people interested in the game and wanted in. They also wanted to bring something new to the game as well. The company began with building the Atarium, the most expensive pinball game on the market at that time ($1,295). Hercules, the largest pinball ever made followed, with Middle Earth the only pinball game to have two playing fields.

Unfortunately, Bally was the reigning king, and it was this competition would change the face of the arcade forever. Atari turned to the newest hype — computers. It began with Spacer Invaders, and the rest was history.

Why bother to try to hit an object with a ball and possibly waste money doing it when you can press and button and the alignment, timing and work is all done for you? Joysticks replaced flippers and balls went the way of Pac-Man and Pole Position. The video game industry also catered to children. The adult could see the pinball machine's surface, could understand the concept of angles and trajectory. To a child it was hit the flippers and hope you got lucky. Computers became the wave of the future.

In the '80s pinball sales decreased. Williams Electronics who made machines for arcades and amusement parts almost went under. Foreign companies that jumped on the American band-wagon also helped add to the industries decline. Pinball technology almost came to a halt; not enough people were willing to shell out the bucks for a dead concept.

So what happened in the '90s? Why the boom? The '90s seems to be a time for past generations to revive a certain piece of pop culture, resurrect it and elevate it back to the relics former glory. Coke in a bottle, Speed Racer, "The Partridge Family," and bell bottoms have all reemerged to define the undefinable era of electronics, CD-ROMs and MTV.

Rebelling against the onslaught of Mortal Kombat type rip-offs and virtual anything is the pinball machine. While tactics and skill have been reduced to x and y buttons, the pinball machine reigns supreme, once again as the paramount game of chance and skill — hands down.

"There are more physical attributes to pinball," says Joel Yang, a grad student in Hotel & Restaurant Management. "You effect the game more than on any other machines."

Pinball has also become, again, the "stress-buster" for students who hope to leave the pressures of university life and take control.

"I get mad at the machines more than happy. I get frustrated, but it is a stress reliever," said Colin Hanley, a senior music major. "It's good though to take stress out in a semi-constructive way."

With the new found popularity of pinball steadily on the rise, it looks like one of America's favorite pastimes could be here to stay. While video games become more and more blood thirsty and pointless, pinball will always be there to catch the backlash.

Sure, the games are becoming increasingly technologically advanced, but the basic principal established over 50 years ago still remain intact. All you need is a pocketful of quarters and the ability to keep your eye on the ball — simple.

Miami 28, Virginia Tech 13 — The 7-1 Hokies were supposed to make the jump to the Top 10 this season. It just hasn't happened. You have to win on the road. Tech couldn't do it at Syracuse and won't be able to upend a Hurricane team on a roll. All of a sudden, the 'Canes are in the thick of things, fighting for a spot to face an undefeated team in the Orange Bowl.

UCLA 34, Stanford 30 — Call this the Disappointment Bowl. The teams have two wins each and have had their superstars struggle. Cardinal QB Steve Stenstrom has disappointed, but Bruin J.J. Stokes has disappeared. UCLA wins it on Homecoming, with wideouts Stokes [finally back from injuries] and Kevin Jordan shredding the weak Stanford defense. Once again, Bill Walsh's inability to build a defense haunts him.

Colorado 21, Nebraska 20 — Too many offensive weapons to hold the Buffaloes down, even in Lincoln. Phillips wins the battle with Salaam, but CU wins the war. Stewart's passing makes the difference, just barely.

What a shame. A healthy Frazier and Nebraska wins the game and the national championship. Instead, only Alabama, Penn State and Colorado are left standing for the title.

Sheila's Day debuts in Rand Theatre

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

The struggle for freedom of African American women and South African women will be brought to the Rand Theater stage this weekend in Duma Ndlova's play, Sheila's Day. The play is presented by the University of Massachusetts Department of Theater and the New WORLD Theater.

Director Roberta Uno and Musical Director Dr. Horace Clarence Boyer have worked to bring the story of South African domestic workers to the campus through drama and music.

The play is set in South Africa, where Black women work as domestics in the homes of the country's White minority. These women are overworked by their employers, and are allowed one day, traditionally Thursday, off to rest. Thursday is also the day that these women come together in prayer circles to heal and renew their spirits.

"Sheila's Day" refers to the day off of the domestic worker whose name is traditionally changed by employers who refuse to learn the more difficult yet melodic birth name. This is a common occurrence in the South African homes of the employers in the play.

In an Oct. 17 New York Times article, journalist Isabel Wilkerson reports that today South African women who are domestic workers face the same struggles of long hours and difficult labor, with rare time off.

Despite the former government's expansion of labor laws earlier this year, which entitled these women sick leave and lunch breaks, domestic workers have hardly been relieved of their harsh circumstances, according to the Times.

Wilkerson found that current government members agree that these laws are usually ignored, due to the isolation of the workers, who are perpetually afraid of losing their jobs.

"Go and ask Mandela," is the common response of employers who do not choose to recognize the new leader of the African National Congress, according to the Times, when asked by workers for a raise.

Wilkerson reports that in the harshest case scenarios, live- ins are viewed as family property. These women are not allowed to leave the premises unless the boss grants them permission. Failure to adhere to the regulations of the employers often results in the women being beaten, raped or killed.

According to the Times, South Africa was built with the expectation that the average middle-class white family would have live-in servants, and this servant/master relationship would be the main meeting point for Blacks and Whites.

Today, many domestic workers leave their children behind to work in homes a day's busride away, according to the Times. As a result of long absences, many of these women are divorced or separated, as most marriages wither in their absence from home.

The government's general response to labor issues has pointed to the Reconstruction and Development Program to create jobs and raise the level of education to enable people to attain better jobs, according to the Times.

Signs of occasional militancy, like picketing outside employers' homes and calling bosses by their first names, have been spotted, according to Wilkerson.

Sheila's Day will present these and other struggles that South African women who are domestic workers have traditionally faced.

The play will run Oct. 27-29 and Nov. 3-5 and 9-12 at 8 p.m. in the Rand Theater. For ticket information call the Fine Arts Center Box Office, 545-2511. Tickets are $6, general, and $5.50 for students.

Irish rockers Black 47 to play Pearl St.

By Tracy Monahan
Collegian Staff

Black 47 is a band that "sprang up from the sidewalks and gutters of New York," according to lead singer Larry Kirwan.

In 1989, the band started as a duo with Kirwan on vocals and electric guitar, and Chris Byrne, a NYPD cop on uileann pipes, tin whistle, bodhran and vocals. They began playing local bars and the group expanded.

"Fred Parcells and Jeffrey Blythe showed up one night and just never left," Kirwan said.

The six member band hails from various parts of the country and includes Kirwan, who is from Ireland, and Blythe who is from England.

In 1992 they released a five-song eponymous EP, then took the music world by storm with the release of Fire of Freedom in March 1993.

Kirwan said their songs, most often described as political in character, are influenced by a variety of music types, including rap, reggae and Irish music.

"I wonder why more bands aren't influenced by more than one type of music," Kirwan said. "It seems like a band makes one type of music, and 500 bands immediately copy it.

"That type of living never appealed to me. If I wanted that type of life, I'd be a banker," Kirwan added.

One of the bands' most famous songs, "Funky Ceili (Bridie's song)" is about a girl left behind while her Irish rocker boyfriend moves off to New York.

When asked if there was really a Bridie, Kirwan laughed.

"Yeah," he said. "The name has been changed to protect the innocent."

Kirwan said their music is more political than most that is heard in Ireland, and people have extreme reactions to it.

"They either love it or they hate it," he said. "They usually react on a political basis.

Black 47 has found a home in Paddy Reilly's bar in New York City, where they play on Wednesdays and Saturdays when they are in the city.

When asked why Paddy Reilly's, Kirwan said, "Why not? It was the biggest dive we could find."

The band is going to be at Pearl Street in Northampton tomorrow night, a place Kirwan said they always like to play.

"It's always a warm, varied audience [at Pearl Street]," Kirwan said.

He said he spent some time in the Valley awhile ago and it's nice to come back.

"I like hanging around and walking through town," he said.

The band recently released a new album Home of the Brave with more of their politically charged music so head on down to Pearl Street to catch the show, grab a Guiness and toss down a few pints of the "food of love," as Kirwan refers to it.

Black 47 will be at Pearl Street in Northampton on Friday, Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m. The show is 21+.

like a little game break, right in the middle of the program, and it's great. Actually, I wouldn't mind if the whole program became a "Timeline" — those news segments are just time-killers anyway.

And I saw CBS' "The Nanny" for the first time the other night. Critically speaking, the show is not much to speak of, but being a native of Massachusetts, I find it difficult not to root for its star Fran Drescher. I just think it's great that somebody with a worse-sounding accent than mine can become a frequent late-night talk show guest and even go on to star in her own sitcom. Watching her program actually made it easier for me to accept my own vocal inadequacies — it was like confidence-building therapy. Thanks to her, all we peculiar-sounding people have hope.

And, finally, I managed to catch former President George Bush's surprise appearance on "Saturday Night Live" last week. Unfortunately, it was the best part of the whole show. You know a comedy program is in trouble when its funniest performer isn't even a member of the permanent cast.

Well, Bush doesn't have much to do these days, so maybe the producers should consider signing other struggling has-beens to their remake SNL into a kind of "Comedy Revue of Presidents Past." Featured in their debut episode: a skit entitled "Forrest Gump: His Wit and Wonder 50 Years Later," with Ronald Reagan over dump and with special guest Nancy as "Mummy." It'll be a block-buster, guaranteed.

Warren Beatty steals a salad, plugs his new film

By Hillel Italie
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Warren Beatty relaxes in an armchair and lets one leg hang over the side. As he begins discussing his current project, a remake of the romantic comedy Love Affair, a waiter wheels an order of Cobb salad into the hotel room.

"Is that for you?" Beatty asks the reporter interviewing him. No.

"I'll have it," he says quickly.

But someone else ordered that salad.

"I'll have it anyway."

Beatty lifts off the lid from the plate, turns around and asks the waiter to bring up some raisin rolls. By the time they arrive, about 20 minutes later, the salad is half-finished and the topic has shifted to Beatty's own past, which he finds far less useful to explore.

"There's no point in looking back, because you don't know what brought you to here. HERE is the only important moment," he declares, pointing to the food in front of him.

The salad?

"That's in the past," he says, reaching for a roll and holding it up.

"THIS is now."

Both on and off the screen, Beatty long has been famous for knowing exactly what he wants, until something better comes along. He's an icon of the sexual revolution who made an uninhibited spirit to movies such as Shampoo and Bonnie and Clyde.

For years, this actor-writer-director-producer saw the press as just another commitment to avoid, a waste of time that only diverted attention from his movies.

Now, he thinks interviews are unavoidable, part of the same mass distribution system that seems to have made talkers out of such once-silent stars as Beatty, Woody Allen and Robert De Niro.

"It's part of the marketing process and you do it," Beatty said during a recent conversation that lasted for much of the afternoon.

"There was a period in American movie-making that was not dependent on demographic research for its financing. We went through a period, starting with Bonnie and Clyde (1967), and through Reds (1981), where we might have felt we were being more honest if we didn't give it a confected ending."

Beatty never has been an easy interview, but he's an engaging one, an intelligent one — evasive, but never dull. He likes challenging you. He will question the question, suggest a better one, speculate on why you asked it.

On occasion, he will even praise the question, which, however, doesn't guarantee he will provide an answer.

An expert on Hollywood history, Beatty admits Love Affair is a sentimental movie. It's a remake of the 1939 hit that starred Charles Boyer as a playboy who falls for Irene Dunne, even after a car accident leaves her in a wheelchair.

The story also was brought back for the 1957 release An Affair to Remember, which was featured in last year's Sleepless in Seattle.

While Beatty said he had wanted to remake Love Affair for years, the timing of the movie's release can't help but draw attention to his private life. Beatty, of course, stars as the playboy. His love interest is played by Annette Bening, for whom he ended his near-legendary bachelorhood two years ago.

"I don't want to leap too quickly to accept your premise. I'm doing a movie about a reformed playboy, so I understand your premise. But I don't want to fall for it," said Beatty, who has two children with Bening.

"I compare this movie to standing up and singing an old standard in the middle of a rap concert. I don't think you wonder who did this song before. You think, 'This is a good tune and I like it.'"

He is now 57, but Beatty fans should be assured he looks great in person, even with the inevitable wrinkles and a head of hair that's grayer than on screen.

With bright sunshine providing the perfect backlight, Beatty has the look of an old-fashioned, Hollywood star. His build is lean, like Grant's or Gary Cooper's, and he wears the kind of casual, but stylish clothes they might have worn in their leisure time: black slacks and a smooth, gray turtleneck.

The younger brother of Shirley MacLaine, Beatty was born in Richmond, Va., in 1937. He was raised in what he has called a rigid, middle-class household. He was a football star in high school, but turned down several scholarships to concentrate on acting.

Drama classes at Northwestern University proved a bore. He dropped out in 1955 and studied acting under Stella Adler in New York. He arrived in Hollywood a few years later, making his film debut in 1961 in Splendor in the Grass with Natalie Wood.

"It was at the tail end of the studio system," Beatty recalled. "Contracts were falling apart. There were not a lot of media outlets. The people in there had tremendous power out of proportion: Hedda Hopper, Louella Parsons. Walter Winchell was still around."

Most actors have to appear in at least a few features before acquiring an off-screen reputation, but Beatty's was in place from the beginning, thanks to a well-publicized affair with Joan Collins, when his acting experience was limited to television and theater.

Splendor in the Grass nicely sets the stage for his life and career. Beatty and Wood star as high-school sweethearts whose relationship is destroyed by her insistence on abstaining from sex. Privately, Wood had no such objections, as was the case with such future co-stars as Julie Christie, Diane Keaton, Madonna and Bening.

Publicly, Splendor in the Grass established Beatty's early screen persona as a troubled young man who could drive women out of their minds.

"When I played The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone, I did it because I didn't want to get pigeonholed into the Splendor in the Grass neurotic," Beatty said of his second movie, in which he played a gigolo.

"It's funny, you look back at them and who are you kidding? You're you and you're doing what you do."

Still, Beatty disparages connections between his roles and what they say about the actor himself. "You're victimized by this assignment," he tells the reporter. "You have to do this for the story."

But the connections are irresistible and they can make you rethink his unconventional image. While Beatty's marriage and fatherhood were likened to the crumbling of the Berlin Wall, his films make his own "downfall" seem almost predictable.

Beatty & Bening can't save dramatically inert 'Love Affair'

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

LOVE AFFAIR
Directed by Glen Gordon Caron
With Warren Beatty, Annette Bening and Katharine Hepburn

There's a little to like and nothing to love about Love Affair, a tedious retread of 1957's Cary Grant–Deborah Kerr sapfest An Affair To Remember, which is in itself a remake of 1939's Love Affair. Both of which are the source for all that dopey Empire State Building stuff in Sleepless In Seattle.

Consider this version the establishment flip-side to Pulp Fiction. Director Caron (Clean and Sober) and writers Warren Beatty and Robert Towne (Chinatown) are trying to reinvent for the nth time this sort–of classic tale of love, pride and impossibly beautiful people fretting over their destiny for a world–weary, cynic–heavy nineties.

The film is aggressively old–fashioned, right down to a cameo by Katharine Hepburn — a bit of inspired, if misfired stunt casting. But all of this old–style Hollywood posturing renders the film dramatically inert, and Beatty and Annette Bening end up with schmaltz all over their faces.

Beatty plays an ex–quarterback who's engaged to be married to an Oprah–esque talk show queen played by Kate Capshaw. Annette Bening is a singer and sometime interior director who's engaged to an investor played by Pierce Brosnan.

B & B fall in love after the plane they meet on has to make an emergency landing in the South Seas (don't ask). All of this is set up so that the newly happy couple can get the blessing of Beatty's aunt (Hepburn) who just so happens to live nearby on the island of Bora Bora. Uh–huh.

But the cruel hands of Fate intervene when they return to New York and agree to meet on the top of the Empire State Building. Will the lovers be reunited? Will Bening, for whom he ended his near-legendary bachelorhood two years ago.

"I don't want to leap too quickly to accept your premise. I'm doing a movie about a reformed playboy, so I understand your premise. But I don't want to fall for it," said Beatty, who has two children with Bening.

"I compare this movie to standing up and singing an old standard in the middle of a rap concert. I don't think you wonder who did this song before. You think, 'This is a good tune and I like it.'"

Drama classes at Northwestern University proved a bore. He dropped out in 1955 and studied acting under Stella Adler in New York. He arrived in Hollywood a few years later, making his film debut in 1961 in Splendor in the Grass with Natalie Wood.

"It was at the tail end of the studio system," Beatty recalled. "Contracts were falling apart. There were not a lot of media outlets. The people in there had tremendous power out of proportion: Hedda Hopper, Louella Parsons. Walter Winchell was still around."

Most actors have to appear in at least a few features before acquiring an off-screen reputation, but Beatty's was in place from the beginning, thanks to a well-publicized affair with Joan Collins, when his acting experience was limited to television and theater.

Splendor in the Grass nicely sets the stage for his life and career. Beatty and Wood star as high-school sweethearts whose relationship is destroyed by her insistence on abstaining from sex. Privately, Wood had no such objections, as was the case with such future co-stars as Julie Christie, Diane Keaton, Madonna and Bening.

Publicly, Splendor in the Grass established Beatty's early screen persona as a troubled young man who could drive women out of their minds.

"When I played The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone, I did it because I didn't want to get pigeonholed into the Splendor in the Grass neurotic," Beatty said of his second movie, in which he played a gigolo.

"It's funny, you look back at them and who are you kidding? You're you and you're doing what you do."

Still, Beatty disparages connections between his roles and what they say about the actor himself. "You're victimized by this assignment," he tells the reporter. "You have to do this for the story."

But the connections are irresistible and they can make you rethink his unconventional image. While Beatty's marriage and fatherhood were likened to the crumbling of the Berlin Wall, his films make his own "downfall" seem almost predictable.

Nonconformists don't fare well in his movies. The dreamers, from McCabe and Mrs. Miller to Reds to Bugsy, die young. The womanizers, from All Fall Down to Shampoo, are more frustrated romantics than carefree bachelors.

"Most of us are fairly cynical by the time we get to our 20s," Beatty said. "What's truthful and hopeful about Love Affair is that it's possible to stop being cynical and to be hopeful and you can redeem yourself from all that cynicism and cavorting and you can love in sickness and in health."

What's wrong with cavorting?

"I don't think there's anything wrong with cavorting. There are good times and then there are good times. People just shouldn't be misled that that's the best time. For me, in my opinion, it's not. Fun is fun, but then there's other fun. It's better fun.

"When you're cavorting," he said, "other people can look and say you're cavorting. You think you're just trying to find your way, but other people just see it from the outside."

Orchestra opens season with classics

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

When it comes to the genre of classical music, the five college area is able to attract some of the biggest names and orchestras to our various venues. Ranging from the indelible softness of quartets such as the Juilliard, to the massive singing and orchestration that envelopes the Bulgarian Women's Choir, we are lucky to be able to have these organizations perform in the expanse of the Pioneer Valley. Even if we don't even realize it sometimes.

On Oct. 29 at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium, our own masterpiece, the University Orchestra, will perform its opening concert of the season. Featuring Mozart's Overture to The Magic Flute, Ravel's Mother Goose ballet and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the local incarnation of classical music stylings will look to do justice to these majestic works.

Featuring nationally recognized guest conductors for their 1994-1995 concerts, this evening's program will feature conductor Neil Gittleman. In his ninth season of being the Music Director of the Marion (Indiana) Philharmonic, and sixth season as associate conductor of the Milwaukee Symphony, this 1975 graduate of Yale University should bring his 13 years of experience behind the podium to the fore.

Regarded by James DePriest, music director of the Oregon Symphony Orchestra, as "one of the most promising talents of his generation," Gittleman has guest conducted with the likes of the l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, and the Chicago, San Francisco and Indianapolis Symphony Orchestras. Also, he has recently been considered as one of the four finalists for the post of music director of the Springfield Symphony.

With this being the opening presentation of the University Orchestra, and combined with a nationally lauded figure in Gittleman at the helm, the season looks to be setting out on the right course. They may not be one of the biggest names in classical music, but it is the quality and feeling of the music that counts.

The concert will begin at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Tickets for the concert are $3 for students, children and senior citizens, and $6 for the general public. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (545-2511) or at the door on the evening of the concert.

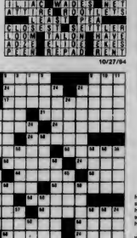
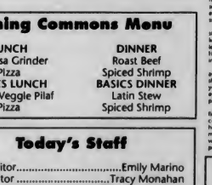
ANSWER TO PREVIOUS PUZZLE





10/27/94 Universal Press Syndicate

The Far Side By Gary Larson

"Uh, uh, uh — I wouldn't do that, Thorg. I know how to use this thing."

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Favorable friends influence romance, creative pursuits and children's activities. Grow your hair long again, you happie freak. Doing something to a relative will bring you both happiness for a long time to come.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Voicing your suggestions to the right person will improve business and boost your earnings. Cultivate an independent attitude to avoid relying too heavily on mate.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Organize your agenda, and get an early start this morning. Shrugging off any frustrations or setbacks will let you concentrate on sexual endeavors. Loved one needs a change. Try something new tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) After a slow start, a community or business project will keep you busy. An upbeat telephone call or letter will lift your spirits. Be wary of new financial entanglements. A disgruntled investor could cause problems.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Someone could ask odd questions about a love relationship. Be direct. Only you can decide what you want the future to hold. An active approach is essential when discussing partnership matters.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Innovative technical solutions and relationship compliments will be the questions. Job-related hours are the best time for confidential meetings and secret encounters. Balance workaholic tendencies with pleasurable pursuits. Neighbors help, if asked.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) If you must go on a trip, leave the driving to others. Use words to uplift, not wound. It pays to take the initiative in sexual matters. Make sure an insurance policy is ready.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) A delightful new admirer appears, perhaps someone you met last weekend. Or last, letting the anger in not a possibility. Investigate a last-minute invitation that is enticing. A flexible approach pays big.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Be more observant when dealing with influential people. Try to fit into a group without attracting disapproving. A long-time career goal moves within reach. Lessons learned in the past could apply tonight. Keep your cool!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Be willing to make minor adjustments for the sake of the entire group. Do not despair if your love life seems lackluster. Things will soon pick up. Be more considerate of elder family members.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Confidential matters look promising if linked to romance or a creative project. Heed advice from experts. Your career goals probably need revision. Be on the lookout for unexpected financial opportunities. Timely investments pay off.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) You could feel a bit overwhelmed today. A hobby or avocation can bring the fulfillment that job activities fail to provide. You are much more creative than you realize. Give your imagination free rein.

Minutewomen victorious, avoid 'quick' goal

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

Over the past few weeks, the quick-strike factor had played a big part in the struggles of the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team.

So one could understand head coach Jim Rudy's reaction when a Vermont player broke in alone, just one minute into yesterday's match. But sophomore goalkeeper Nancy Kieser, making her first collegiate start, quelled Rudy's nerves in making a remarkable diving save on the shot.

And from there, UMass never looked back, rolling to a 5- 0 triumph over the Catamounts.

Vermont 0

"I thought we were going to do Hartford again here," Rudy said of a game earlier in the season in which Hartford, a 2-1 victor, scored in the first minute. "Realistically, looking at it, they broke through and they got a shot in the first minute. We gave away a near goal, but got a great save."

"I knew about the [quick-strike] problem, so I made myself realize that I wasn't going to let one in the first five minutes," Kieser said. "When I saw the ball coming through, I just slid out and wanted to get a hand on it, or anything on it. And I did, and hit it over the crossbar."

The Minutewomen, who improved their record to 11-5, used the save as a momentum-builder.

Sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers led the way, tallying a hat-trick with all three scores coming on headers.

At 25:46, sophomore midfielder Julie Magid served a corner kick toward the goal that no player could gain possession of. In a scramble, Myers headed the ball to the near post for the goal as the ball barely crossed the goal- line.

In the second half, UMass built off the tally, with Myers scoring twice in a span of five minutes. Both goals were identical with long crossing passes to the goal-mouth.

"They were great serves and the defenders let me go," Myers said. "Nobody really tracked me. I just saw the ball coming, and I just wanted to get my head on it. I was told that you jump first, then once you're in the air, then you connect. I didn't really have to do anything. It was all in the serves."

PAUL BILODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Rachel LeDuc and the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team used their heads in shutting out Vermont 5-0 yesterday afternoon, with three headers as goals.

The first serve was produced by senior defender Heidi Kocher, while the second was delivered by senior forward Melissa Mitchell.

From there, junior forward Nicole Roberts scored at 75:46, and sophomore midfielder Sandy Shimogaki tallied at 80:29.

All together, it was a good feeling for the players to get back on the winning track, as the victory snaps a two game skid.

"It feels good to win again. I think we played as team," Myers said. "We played for each other today which makes it feel even more special. It's just a matter of winning, not who scores the goals."

"It definitely feels good. We kept possession and had control of the ball, and that builds everyone's confidence," Kocher said. "That was shown in the service, the finishing, the defense, and in goal."

Now, the Minutewomen set their sights on tomorrow's match against St. Bonaventure. A win will secure sole possession of first place in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

After the meeting with the Bonnies, the team travels to Cornell on Sunday in a match that very well could decide if an invitation to the NCAA's is on the way to Amherst.

UMass can only hope to build on yesterday's victory.

"We've been coming around. Emotionally, we looked different and sounded different against UConn [a 2-1 loss on Saturday]," Rudy said. "Coming back, you just can't do it all at once. We fell too far in the way we were feeling about ourselves. That was a lot to come back from that quickly. And I'd say we're still on the way back."

"I think we're getting there," Kieser said. "I think we have a long way to go, but we're getting there slowly and this definitely helps — 5-0 is a good win for us."

"We know we need to do it and it's in our hands," Kocher said.

The two upcoming matches provide UMass an opportunity to prove it's an NCAA caliber team. Two wins will most likely lock up a bid. But avoiding the quick-strike factor will be a key, and yesterday's convincing win proved exactly why.

Water polo team looks to improve in key weekend Eastern playoff meet

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Sometimes the best lessons learned are the hardest to take.

This upcoming weekend at the Eastern Water Polo Association playoffs held at Brown University in Providence, R.I., the University of Massachusetts men's water polo team will look to bounce back from last weekend's showing at the Baldy View Tournament.

With this being the final EWPA meet before the Eastern Championships, the Minutemen will be looking to get back on the offensive-dominating pace that characterized their play before the journey to Claremont, Calif.

On the surface, last weekend's losses to three Top 20 teams [Air Force, UC-Santa Barbara and UC-San Diego] could be easily seen as a step back for a program that is on the way up.

But this not always so.

Pertaining to most every aspect of competitive and scholarly life is the fact that you have to fall sometimes to be able to take that big step forward.

Even with the Minutemen's winning streak ending at 22 games last Friday, when they lost to 10th-ranked Air Force [6-4], it could possibly be a blessing in disguise at this point of the season.

Coach Russ Yarworth sees the experience last weekend in a favorable light, in terms of the team both in the present as well as in the upcoming contests that face them this Saturday and Sunday.

"Against Santa Barbara, we played extremely well," Yarworth said. "After they scored three quick counterattack goals, and we got jobbed on a few goals, the kids realized that they were just as good a team."

"When we played San Diego, we were up 11-8, and the ref's decided to change their minds on how to call the game. The same calls that were against Luis [Limardo] in the hole position weren't on the other side."

"But you can't blame the ref's, it is their perceptions."

Yarworth is pleased with the Minutemen's learning experience.

"What encouraged me the most was the lesson learned of the level of competition we need to play at," Yarworth said.

"We grew as a team, and now we can look at this weekend and the Easterns with intensity. Both in practice and the games."

The steady emergence of junior Luis Limardo as a primetime player has once again pleased the eye of Coach Yarworth.

Taking one of the lead roles in scoring of late, Limardo has become a force to be reckoned with.

Second on the team in goals [85], assists [34] and total points [119], Limardo has furthered his presence by scoring 10 times in last Saturday's 16-9 victory over the University of Redlands.

Limardo's play of late, in addition to sophomore Ron Gonen, will be welcomed this weekend as UMass looks to solidify a top position in the Eastern Championships.

Yarworth's team will face competition that is familiar to the likes of M.I.T. and Harvard University.

The experience the Minutemen have acquired through the tough contests should pay dividends in the long run.

With a successful game plan and Yarworth's intentions to make final touches on his substitution and team-counterattack strategy, UMass should be ready to play.

The Minutemen, whose record now stands at 24-6, need just one more win to tie the school record for victories in a season with 25.

Revealing weekend for frontrunners

Anthony Guido
On College Football

The game of the year is upon us. The weekend should give us clear frontrunners in the races for the national championship and the Heisman trophy.

Colorado at Nebraska. The winner is in the Orange Bowl to win or share the title. The Buffs have come so far, and beaten so many quality teams. The 'Huskers, as usual, have beaten no one, and their biggest hurdle has been surviving the loss of star quarterback Tommie Frazier.

The battle is at the running back spot, where CU's Rashaan Salaam goes up against NU's Lawrence Phillips. Together with Washington's Napoleon Kaufman, it's a three-man race to pile up the running yards.

Salaam is the modest leader for the Heisman; both he and Phillips have run for over 1,200 yards already. The difference — Salaam has a great offense, with Kordell Stewart to Michael Westbrook a tremendous aerial combination. Phillips doesn't have a comparable unit, and has been the focus of opposing defenses all season.

While the winner of the game is unquestionably at the top of the nation, why hasn't anyone mentioned Alabama? The SEC is at least as good as the Big 8, and not far behind the Big 10. Often maligned for not blowing out opponents, Bama just wins, 8-0 and counting.

The first order of business for the week is the bumbling mistakes made by Florida coach Steve Spurrier. He has benched QB Terry Dean in favor of Danny Wuerffel. Spurrier blames himself for not coaching Dean well enough.

Come on, Steve. Dean was having a wonderful season, with the fourth highest pass-efficiency rating in the nation. He gets benched after one bad game against Auburn. If it is Spurrier's fault, then teach Dean, show him what he is doing wrong. With that quick-trigger mentality, it's a good thing Spurrier stayed out of the NFL.

How far has the Cotton Bowl fallen? Recently signing an agreement with the runners-up from the Pac-10, Big 12 [Big 8 plus four SWC teams], and the WAC, the bowl that used to have Notre Dame now will get Kansas-Brigham Young.

Watch out for those Temple Owls, who somehow scored 42 points in a loss against Syracuse. I have guaranteed that Temple will not win another game this year. Last reasonable chance for the Owls is Saturday against Pittsburgh.

Why can't Boston College win at home against Rutgers? They say a tie is like kissing your sister. Well, tying the Scarlet Knights is like kissing your french poodle. BC [3-2- 1] faces a difficult three-game finish against Big East opponents at the end of the season. Kiss that Bowl bid goodbye.

A large dose of reality will be served up for Duke this weekend. The 7-0 Blue Devils face Florida State. All the pleading for respect will end after a Seminole pounding. FSU still hasn't lost a game in the ACC, and it sure won't happen this season. One problem: Bobby Bowden has re- instated Dan [wide-right] Mowrey at kicker, benching Scott

Minutewomen fight off tough Crimson, 3-1

By Steven Grant

The Harvard Crimson are seeing red.

The reason? They were paid a visit Tuesday night by the University of Massachusetts volleyball team, who fought off several Crimson surges en route to a 3-1 victory. UMass won with scores of 15-9, 11-15, 15-0 and 15-9.

UMass, who improved its record to 18-3, had problems early on, but soon got its act together in the third game, winning every point.

"For a while there we weren't playing as a team," said sophomore Dionne Nash. "After we lost the second game Coach [Bonnie] Kenny reminded us that we weren't communicating, and if we're going to be successful that's what we have to do be doing."

Nash led UMass with a total of 15 kills, but the outside hitter's true stat of the day was her career-best .500 hitting percentage.

Also playing well was Cass Anderson. The junior setter led the Minutewomen with 10 digs and 48 assists.

But it was Michelle Paciorek who had perhaps the best game of her career. The freshman middle blocker from Sunderland, finished with a career-high eight blocks, while registering 12 kills and an impressive .375 hitting percentage.

The third game was the highlight for the Minutewomen. It marked the second time this year they have shutout their opponent in a game, with the other coming in a win over Hartford on Sept. 17. UMass has held opponents to just one point on three separate occasions.

The Minutewomen finished the flawless game with 13 kills and only two errors in 20 total attacks, earning them a .550 hitting percentage.

"The key was that everyone contributed," Nash said. "We had a well-balanced attack. Cass helped out a lot with her assists, and I owe a lot of my kills to her."

"I'm happy with the way our team played," said Leigh Readey, who finished with seven kills and a .429 hitting percentage. "Personally, I'm glad I played better than I have been."

"Everyone did their part, and when we do so, we're usually successful."

The Minutewomen will return to action this weekend, when they play host to two Atlantic 10 opponents, Rutgers on Friday and Temple on Saturday.

Earlier in the season, UMass handily defeated Rutgers 3-0.

However, against the Owls, it was completely the opposite, as the Minutewomen were handed their worst loss of the season. Temple breezed by its A-10 rival at home in three straight games, 11-15, 3-15 and 12-15.

UMass' record improves to an impressive 18-3.

Minutemen to end season at McGuirk with four games

By Anthony Guido

Junior defensive end Vernard Fennell [91] will miss his fifth straight game as the University of Massachusetts football team hosts Boston University this weekend.

The University of Massachusetts football team returns home after losing two of three on the road. The Minutemen [4-3, 3-2 in Yankee Conference] take on Boston University [6-1, 4-1] on Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

UM Minuteman Notes

Four in a row at home — UMass finishes out its season with four straight home games. Northeastern comes to McGuirk after BU. Youngstown State, currently ranked No. 3 in the nation, comes in on November 12. Connecticut rounds out the schedule on November 19.

Hoping to rebound. Last week the Minutemen were blown away 52-14 at the hands of Delaware, the most points the Minutemen have yielded since 1987. Coach Mike Hodges was embarrassed at the loss and has put the team through a tough practice week heading to the BU game.

"This is a very important game for our season, they beat us last year. This is a big Yankee Conference game for us," Hodges said.

Looking at last year — In 1993 the Minutemen visited BU in the third week of the season and were ambushed 28-9. The Terriers blocked a Justin Riemer punt for a touchdown in the first quarter. BU quarterback Robert Dougherty was 19 for 28 passing, throwing for 200 yards.

Hodges against the heavyweights — Hodges has had success [4-1] against nationally-ranked opponents. BU represents the sixth Top 25 foe in the Hodges era. The lone loss was last season at home against William and Mary.

Yankee Conference Update — New Hampshire continues to surprise and leads the New England division at 4-0. BU is second at 4-1, with the Minutemen next at 3-2. James Madison paces the Mid-Atlantic division at 4-1, having beaten William and Mary last week, knocking the Tribe to 3-2.

Minuteman rankings — The UMass defense is the top-ranked unit in the Yankee Conference. The Minutemen are ranked No. 15 in Division I-AA, allowing 272.2 yards per game. UMass is No. 5 in the country in pass efficiency defense with a 82.3 rating, again leading the YanCon.

The rushing offense is ranked No. 13 in the nation, averaging 236.3 yards per game.

Rene Ingoglia is fourth in rushing in all of Division I-AA, and leads the YanCon with a 141.6 yard per game average.

Possible milestones for Ingoglia — The junior running back needs only 68 yards to reach 3,000 for his career. He would become only the second rusher in UMass history to break the 3,000 mark, joining all-time leading rusher Garry Pearson.

With nine yards on Saturday, Ingoglia becomes first runner since Pearson to go over the 1,000 yard mark in consecutive seasons.

Injury status for key players — Defensive end Vernard Fennell, suffering from a hairline fracture of his left fibula, is questionable to see his first action since the Rhode Island.

Wide receiver Daryl Thomas [shoulder separation] also is questionable for Saturday, having missed the Delaware game. The status of back-up running back Tony Palmer [MRI on his back] is uncertain.

Trying to live up to the expectations

Junior fullback Rene Ingoglia is attempting to regain the form that got him 313 yards against Rhode Island (See Sports, page 8).

Kennedy and Romney square off in Holyoke

Mitt Romney, Republican candidate for Senator, was in Holyoke last night for the second of two debates with Sen. Edward Kennedy. He is seen here in the first debate which took place Tuesday night in Boston.

Candidates field questions in second senatorial debate

HOLYOKE — Last night in the second of two public debates, U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy said he should be re– elected because he has built a foundation in Washington. D.C. Mitt Romney, the Republican contender for the seat, said he should be elected because he has the skills "attuned to the times" to bring jobs to Massachusetts.

Kennedy has served as a Massachusetts senator for the past 32 years. Romney is new to the political scene as a self– made businessman from Belmont, though his family has been in politics in the past.

Romney said he hoped to turn around what he said he sees as the "great American tragedy" of high taxes and increased governmental spending, which he said he believes is crippling the American middle class.

"The middle class is being crushed and squeezed," Romney said and pledged he would not raise taxes on the middle class if elected.

Kennedy said he wanted to "build on the building blocks" he had already established in his time as senator. He also urged voters to consider who they think would be the best voice in Washington on issues which concern Massachusetts families and residents.

The two candidates spoke in a town hall forum last night, 10 days before the election, at Holyoke Community College in the second of two public debates sponsored by the Boston Globe and the Boston Herald. The first debate, held on Tuesday in Boston, resulted in the candidates hurling insults and attacking each other on what they saw as the issues.

In last night's format, there were 12 panelists from cities and towns throughout the state, directing questions to one or both of the candidates, including two HCC students.

The crowd was charged with people chanting and holding placards near the entrance of the hall. Both Kennedy and Romney supporters sang in support of their candidate and tried to out-do each other as several T.V. cameras attempted to record the scene.

Within the packed hall, which seats 350, there were people sitting in the isles and standing in the back of the

Challengers have to climb to beat state's incumbents

By Andrew Davidson
Collegian Staff

The distinction between local and national politics is beginning to blur, and never has this been more apparent than in this year's two most crucial Massachusetts races, the gubernatorial battle between Republican incumbent William Weld and thrifty Democrat Mark Roosevelt, and the fierce battle for the Senate between political fixture Ted Kennedy and the private-sector outsider Mitt Romney.

ELECTION 1994

News Analysis

The political landscape

While Bill Clinton made his obligatory campaign stop in Boston on Oct. 20 to help an ailing incumbent Senator Kennedy, Mitt Romney and Gov. Weld toured the Acme Printing Shop in Wilmington, Mass., touting each other's affinity for the private sector, and strengthening the tie between two men who hope to be the major players in Massachusetts come January.

What Mark Roosevelt has in ideological momentum he lacks in the ultimate gauge of strength in a campaign: funds. Through the end of last week, Weld and Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci had about $1 million in campaign funds, some 25 times as much as the $41,500 of Roosevelt and running mate Robert K. Massie have in their coffers, and have spent $460,000 on television advertising as well as $32,137 on polling.

And while Mitt Romney's wealth has put him on an even keel with Kennedy which forced the senator to borrow $2 million, he still lacks the political grounding which the senator has spent the last 32 years building. Indeed, the two charismatic challengers have a lot of ground to make up in the next week and a half if they wish to unseat two popular incumbents.

Fight for the Senate

Indeed, the race between Kennedy and Romney is a battle royale of epic proportions, a tug of war between two men who have comparable clout but find themselves on opposite sides of the political spectrum. Kennedy has stuck to his position as the die–hard liberal who has fought to secure the state's chunk of the federal budget, while Romney challenges that very record as the cause of the bloated federal government.

Romney's answers to balancing the budget are not as realistic as he would like them to be. His obligation to liberal Massachusetts voters forced him to take a position against cutting Medicare, and he toes the party line by supporting current levels of spending in defense, two factors which may tie his hands if he intends on bringing federal spending in line with revenues.

But Romney supports cutting taxes and providing tax breaks for individuals which would encourage savings; his proposal would allow individuals to save $2,500 and families to save $5,00 without being taxed.

An uphill battle

The race for governor, however, has only begun to attract attention in recent weeks. Because of Weld's ability to lower taxes and balance the state budget, he has made the typically liberal populous abandon the traditional ideology championed by Democrats for so long. "The swing suburban voters who dumped John Silber for Weld don't like taxes, welfare, immigrants, public school teachers or labor unions in general," says political commentator and Boston Globe columnist David Nyhan.

But Roosevelt's vigorous challenge of Weld's legitimacy as the beacon of the state has increased

Variety of opinions on debate

Supporters disagree on who appeared more capable for the job

HOLYOKE — In a sea of "Kennedy" and "Romney" signs, hundreds of ralliers spotted the campus of Holyoke Community College in anticipation of the Kennedy/Romney face-off.

According to Springfield State Police Lieutenant Catellier, there were approximately 25 Holyoke police officers, six state troopers, and numerous security officers from the community college and surrounding schools.

Catellier reported no major out breaks or fights with the large crowd.

"There was a little shoving," said Catellier. "But that was just fighting for space in a tight area."

Allowing only about 350 ticket holding people into the debate, most would not be able to attend. Many were being bussed to Springfield, however, to watch the debates.

University of Massachusetts President Michael K. Hooker was in attendance at the debate.

There were split opinions in the crowd as to who had performed better in the last debate held in Boston on Oct. 25.

"I hope to see Ted Kennedy do as well as he did the other night," said Ed Pagliaro of Springfield.

Gloria Raffa, a Romney supporter also from Springfield, said she felt differently.

"I think Romney did very good the other night," said Raffa. "He was honest and sincere. He showed he was a businessman who knows how to bring in jobs."

Supporters from both sides agreed that the 'mudslinging' and negative campaigning had to stop.

"We definitely can do without it," Julie Green, a Kennedy supporter from North Adams, said. "In all honesty though, it wouldn't be a campaign if that didn't go on, it's really unfortunate."

Bill Fisher, who recently moved to Massachusetts and was there to show his support for Romney, said he felt the same way.

"I hope to see more substantial issues addressed," said Fisher. "The last debate was all mudslinging and finger pointing — we need to get down to the brass tacks of the issues."

Catharine Morrish of Northampton had the same opinion as many Romney supporters, that they want to see something new in office.

Governor battle heats up in fight over taxes, crime

By Derek Milosavljevic

While the race for the Massachusetts Governor's seat may not be as tight as the fight for the U.S. Senate seat — the battle is no less fierce.

Wednesday night, Republican incumbent Gov. William Weld squared off with Democratic challenger Mark Roosevelt in the second of two debates.

Weld holds a commanding lead in the polls over Roosevelt, a 38–year-old state representative from Boston, but was aware that the challenger picked up support and crucial campaign funds following his strong performance in the first debate last week.

ELECTION 1994

Lacking the money for extensive radio and television advertising, Roosevelt conducted extensive campaigning throughout the state, including a visit to the University of Massachusetts this semester. Weld has not campaigned in the Amherst area.

Wednesday's debate saw the candidates exchange harsh words on a variety of issues, notably crime and taxes.

Weld, who repeatedly disparaged Roosevelt's voting record in the state legislature, attacked his opponent for voting against a measure that would require uveniles charged with violent crimes automatically be tried as adults.

"How do you look the woman who has been brutally raped in the eye and tell her that the person who raped her should be out of prison in six months because he happened to be 17 years old?" Weld pressed his challenger.

Roosevelt fired back, charging that the Governor was playing upon peo-auditorium throughout the hour-long forum. At various points, the crowd broke into cheers and applause, despite demands by moderator Gail Harris of WABU-TV-Boston, to hold applause until the closing remarks.

The two remained relatively calm in comparison to Tuesday night's debate, focusing mainly on the questions asked by individuals of the panel. The only point at which the candidates exchanged heated words was when Kennedy ended a response with there are "no easy answers" to questions on welfare reform and the prevention of teenage pregnancies.

Romney fired back, "There are no easy answers — there are wrong answers."

Both candidates pledged a reform in the welfare systems and a tough stance on crime.

Romney and Kennedy said they are in favor of a strong educational system and pledge to continue or increase funding of federal loans and grants.

Kennedy said he was the supporter of a recent education bill in Washington which expanded funds available for financial aid and which also eliminated the consideration of homes as assets to be counted against a student's eligibility to receive federal funds. Kennedy said 100,000 more students were eligible for loans and grants because of the exclusion of homes as assets.

At one point, panelist George Riethof, a real estate appraiser of Charlestown, asked Kennedy about alleged cocaine use and abuse of alcohol, in connection with a recent book produced by a former worker. Kennedy replied all the charges in the book came before a Senate ethics committee and were found to be "false in their entirety." The crowd booed and hissed at the question.

The candidates disagreed on how to provide the resources children need to grow and become part of society. Romney said the development of a child begins in the home with two parents.

Kennedy said children should be provided a range of social and health services in the early years of life, which he said would increase successful children in the educational system.

The election will be held Nov. 8 his appeal to voters, reminding them the merits of his liberal ideology. "By giving the voters a reason to vote for the Democrat, not just glumly obligated in some fuzzy way," Nyhan said, "Roosevelt supplied the kind of leadership this dispirited party has been lacking."

Gaining ground

The recent momentum in his campaign has begun to attract more funds, something Roosevelt desperately needs if he intends to challenge the popular mix of social libertarianism and fiscal conservatism platformed by Weld. According to the state Office of Campaign and Political Finance, Roosevelt raised $56,417 from Oct. 1 to Oct. 15, comparable to the $64,555 raised by Weld.

Campaign tactics

The ultimate effect the race will have on the state is not on the outcome, which has been all but decided in both races. What has changed is the "political landscape" of Massachusetts. Gov. Weld's scathing attacks of Roosevelt have drawn criticism from much of the Boston media, citing numerous inaccuracies. Even Romney, who has used his good character as one of his selling points, has resorted to using negativity in his advertising. And Ted Kennedy has launched negative ads for the first time in his 32-year career.

"To salvage this race, they've got to get negative," says Rick Reed, a Romney media consultant. "The only way they're going to win is if the public thinks worse of Mitt than of Ted Kennedy."

pies fears with regard to crime. He said as governor he would emphasize education and strengthen the Department of Youth Services.

Early on in the debate, Roosevelt went after Weld for opposing the graduated income tax. The challenger accused Weld of opposing the tax, which the Revenue Department says would cut taxes for 92 percent of people and 82 percent of business owners, in order to protect his rich friends.

Weld countered that the tax would harm the state's business climate and economy. With two of the state's leading democrats, former presidential candidate Paul Tsongas and Weld's 1990 governor's race opponent, John Silber taking a stand against the tax, Weld asked Roosevelt if they must be protecting their rich friends as well.

Roosevelt, who has been chairman of the state legislature's Education Committee has said that the government has not shouldered enough of the burden of public higher education.

In a September interview with the Daily Collegian, Roosevelt said, "The burden of the financing has been too much on the students and too little on the state. UMass deserves more support. We need to better integrate our public universities into our economic revitalization."

When Roosevelt questioned the wisdom of allowing gambling in New Bedford, which Weld supports, the Governor replied that New Bedford's population wants casino gambling "by a margin of 98–2." He added with venom that typified the debate and much of the campaign, "You think they're too stupid to understand what's right for them."

Yes, it's always a fine day for a barbeque. Ahh nothing like the heat from the coals to cause a man to break down in a fit of hysterical crying. "WHY DIDN'T I LISTEN TO MY MOTHER AND BECOME A DOG GROOMER!!!"

Initiative to remove fee from students' bills

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

Throughout Amherst, there are blue and yellow signs with the slogan "No on 3" referring to ballot Question 3 in the upcoming Nov. 8 election.

The referendum question, which is of particular interest to student groups at the University of Massachusetts, proposes to prohibit student groups from collecting waivable fees on students' tuition bills.

Supporters of Question 3 say it will put an end to undemocratic and unfair process of collecting student fees. The opposition of Question 3 say the initiative is a violation of student rights and unfairly dictates what students may do with their fees.

Collection of student fees

Student groups such as MASSPIRG, a student-run group which lobbies for environmental issues and consumer rights, are particularly worried about the question because it could potentially cut off all of the groups funding, according to Julia Lev, chair of the "No on 3" campaign and also a co- chair of the UMass–Amherst chapter of MASSPIRG.

Lev said if the ballot question passes, MASSPIRG will cease to exist in the upcoming spring semester.

Presently, MASSPIRG has a waivable fee on students' tuition bill which donates $4 to the group. The group is not funded by the Student Government Association or from the University.

The question targets the "waivable fee" on students' tuition bills at UMass as well as state and community colleges. If passed, the question would prohibit students from authorizing a waivable fee on tuition bills for nonpartisan student organizations.

Voting "no" on the ballot question would repeal the new law regarding student fees.

The Boston Globe recently editorialized on Question 3, urging its readers to vote no on Question 3 because student fees should be collected in a more fair way.

Several student leaders through campus see Question 3 as a violation of students' rights and the right to free speech. While leaders of MASSPIRG see the ballot question as a direct attack on their group, they also said Question 3 would cripple any student group seeking funds through a waivable fee.

"This takes away the ability of students to speak up in the state legislature," said Sean Kelly, a freshman and a member of MASSPIRG who is doing an internship on the campaign.

Heather Foran, a sophomore doing an internship on the "No on 3" campaign, said by voting yes on Question 3, students would lose their power to lobby in the state legislature. She said the tuition freeze this semester was an example of how important it is for students to lobby the state legislature.

"It would be taking away our rights to be heard in our lobbying realm," Foran said.

Issues of the way fees are collected

State Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst) said he is for Question 3 because he said the waivable fee is an "undemocratic process." Rosenberg said the way the fee is collected from students presently, all students are considered to be part of a political organization unless students check a box to withhold the fee from their bills.

Rosenberg said Question 3 is not an issue of students' rights.

If the waivable fee was presented in the positive, that is student check a box to donate to an organization, Rosenberg said he would support that waivable fee. He said students must take an "affirmative step" to join a group which he said is not present in the current waivable fee.

"Most people opposed are not opposed to the right to collect fees," Rosenberg said, "But to the structure where all members of the student body are made members of a political organization."

Voters can choose a graduated tax with Question 6

By Andrew Ferguson
Collegian Staff

Much of the focus in the Nov. 8 election will be on ballot Questions 6 and 7, which if passed, would put into place a graduated income tax throughout Massachusetts.

Massachusetts currently has a flat income tax where everyone who pays income taxes pays at the same rate.

Question 6, a proposed amendment to the state constitution, would change the state constitution to abolish the current flat tax rate. Question 7 is a law proposed in conjunction with Question 6 because Question 7 would set the actual tax rates.

The two questions are being advertised as a package and it is unlikely one would pass without the other, according to James Braude, head of the Tax Equity Alliance for Massachusetts who spoke last week at the University of Massachusetts.

Those in favor of the graduated tax say a graduated tax would reduce taxes for 92 percent of Massachusetts' citizens. All couples making less than $101,700 and individuals with an income of less than $62,050 would receive tax cuts.

Of the 42 states throughout the United States that have an income tax, 35 of these states use the sliding scale tax method similar to the ballot questions in the upcoming election.

Opponents to the questions say that if the referendums are passed, then the state legislature will have unlimited powers to raise all income tax levels.

"It comes down to the fact that we must have trust in our government," said UMass Accounting Professor Michael Whiteman, who specializes in taxation.

The legislature already has the power to raise taxes, and this will not change due to the new laws, according to Whiteman and Braude.

"The graduated tax has been at the federal level since 1913, and the federal government is still going strong," said Whiteman. "What's good for the federal is good for the state."

Another argument against the proposed graduated income tax is that it is not indexed for inflation.

Supporters of the questions say that the flat tax currently in use is unfair, and the new system more fairly distributes wealth.

Opponents also say this tax is unfriendly to the already expensive Massachusetts businesses, and threatens the economic recovery that Massachusetts has already made.

"I think people who have more money should pay more in taxes" said UMass economics professor

Turn to QUESTION 6, page 6

Proposed Graduated Income Tax Rates

The proposal of Question 7 would set the following state tax rates for all Massachusetts taxable income, after subtracting applicable deductions and exemptions:

Tax Rate	Single	Married filing jointly	Married filing separately	Head of household
5.5%	up to $50,200	up to $81,000	up to $40,500	up to $60,100
8.8%	over $50,200 to $90,000	over $81,000 up to $150,000	over $40,500 up to $75,000	over $60,100 up to $120,000
9.8%	over $90,000	over $150,000	over $75,000	over $120,000

Other Ballot Questions in Election

Question 2 is a referendum question on the existing seat belt law. The present law requires drivers and passengers in certain motor vehicles to wear properly adjusted and fastened safety belts. There are some exceptions to those who must wear a seat belt, but anyone driving or riding in private passenger motor vehicles or riding in a vanpool vehicle or trucks under 18,000 pounds must wear a safety belt.

Voting "yes" will continue the law passed by the Legislature requiring the use of seat belts.

Voting "no" would repeal the safety belt law.

Question 4 proposes to limit the terms of state and federal public offices. If a candidate appears on the ballot who has served more than the specified amount of time in office, the person would serve without a salary, and in some of the state offices, without payment for certain expenses.

Positions for governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, state treasurer, state auditor, or state attorney general would be able to serve two consecutive terms (eight years) in that office in the eleven years prior to the end of the then-current term of office.

Candidates for governor's councillor, state representative, state senator, or United States representative from Massachusetts could not hold office if the person has served four consecutive terms (eight years) in the office in the nine years prior to the end of the then–current term of office.

United States senators from Massachusetts could not hold office if the candidate served two consecutive terms (12 years) in that office in the 17 years prior to the end of the then–current term of office.

Voting "yes" would prevent the name of a person being printed on the state ballot as a candidate for certain offices if the person has already served a specific number of terms in that office.

Voting "no" would make no change to the state election laws.

Question 5 would allow retail stores to open at any time on Sundays and the legal holidays of Memorial Day, Fourth of July and Labor Day. This ballot question would not change the restriction on Sundays and these holidays. Stores opening under the proposed law would be required to make Sunday and holiday work voluntary and would be required to pay most employees at least one and one–half time their regular rate.

Voting "yes" would allow retail stores to open on Sunday mornings and on these holidays.

Voting "no" would make no change in the law regulating the hours of retail stores at these times.

Question 8 proposes an increase in the portion of gasoline tax revenue which would be credited to the state highway fund. It proposes to prohibit the transfer of money from the highway fund to other state funds for other purposes, and also declares the right of citizens to a safe and efficient public highway, road and bridge system. A seven–year state transportation plan would also be demanded.

Voting "yes" would increase the portion of gasoline tax revenue placed into the state highway fund, prohibit the transfer of money from the highway fund to other state fund, and require a detailed plan for highway, road and bridge repair.

Voting "no" would make no change in the operation of the highway fund and would not require a detailed plan for repairs on bridges, roads and highways.

Question 9 proposes to prohibit rent control for most privately owned housing units in the state and would nullify certain existing rent control laws.

Voting "yes" would prohibit rent control for most housing units, eliminate certain existing rent control laws, and allow cities and towns to adopt a limited form of rent control for a six month period.

Voting "no" would in the rent control laws or in the authority of cities and towns to adopt rent control.

ELECTROMAGNETICS RESEARCH
at Northeastern University

Electromagnetics Research — the Career of the 21st Century

Over the past twenty years, a revolution has occurred in electronics, resulting in the proliferation of telephones, facsimile machines, networked computers, automatic teller machines, and cable television services. The next twenty years will see a similar revolution in electromagnetics leading to "networks without connections". New developments in electromagnetic materials and systems will find applications in intelligent vehicles and highways, telemedicine, portable personal communication and entertainment, as well as networks with very high bandwidths.

Other developing areas in electromagnetics include the use of electromagnetic waves in the diagnosis and treatment of disease, the measurement of pollution in the land, sea and air, evaluation and planning of the use of natural resources, and improved weather forecasting.

If you are an undergraduate electrical engineering, mechanical engineering, physics, or mathematics major, you have a chance to be ahead of your time. A career in electromagnetics will put you in a position to be on the leading edge of the profession.

Center for Electromagnetics Research at Northeastern University

The Center for Electromagnetics Research (CER) provides an opportunity for qualified graduate students to perform research with faculty who are recognized leaders in these areas.

Academic studies in the departments of Electrical and Computer Engineering, Physics, Mechanical or Industrial Engineering, is complemented by research work closely related to the course work and to the research interests of the Center's sponsors. The diversity of these sponsors, including contractors working for these agencies, ensures a rich and varied field of research. With more than 20 universities, the concentration of faculty, graduate and undergraduate students, and the Boston location at the hub of Route 128, "America's Technology Highway", working in electromagnetics at the CER provides a vibrant and exciting academic community in which to work and study.

Advantages of University-Industry Collaboration

The Center for Electromagnetics Research has a limited number of positions available for qualified graduate students under the Technology Reinvestment Program. The students will receive stipends and tuition waivers to complete the MS program in Engineering at Northeastern University, and summer salary from M/A-COM to apply their research to intelligent highways, communication systems, and other areas.

The major research of the Center is in the following four general areas:
- Radar Signal Processing
- Electro-Optics
- Plasmas and Materials
- Computational Analysis for EM Applications
- Underground Remote Sensing

Courses in support of these areas include:
- Plasma Theory and Engineering
- Lasers
- Acoustics
- Solid State Devices
- Radar and Communication Systems
- Microwave Engineering
- Remote Sensing
- Antenna Theory and Design
- Optical Properties of Matter
- Electro-Optics Theory and Devices

Get to the polls and cast your vote

On Nov. 8, the statewide elections will be held. Many issues that concern students will be on the ballot and it is our duty to know enough to cast intelligent votes.

Several of the ballot questions, including three, six and seven deal directly with student concerns. The gubernatorial and U.S. Senate seats have both come down to hotly contested races.

Living in a bubble will do no good, because there is life after UMass and the decisions you cast a week from Tuesday could affect your future. Don't sit home, letting the rest of the state decide things for you.

For a lot of people, a vote is the only form of legislative power. Students' voices often go unheard or ignored by politicians and it is time to make a change.

Get out, vote in the election, and have a say in how things work.

The problem with just being a number

She came home to find the message on her answering machine that she thought was a joke. It was from her boss at her work study job.

"We're really sorry to hear that you're leaving," her boss told her through the answering machine. "We hope you'll stop by before you take off."

Unbeknownst to her, Tamara had been withdrawn from the University of Massachusetts on Oct. 14. But it took a sympathy call from her boss 12 days later to let her in on the life changing news.

Scary as it may seem, you may be next.

That's right, everybody. Health Services has been withdrawing people left and right over the past few weeks for unpaid bills. And on top of it, they seem to have been leaving the burden of telling their victims to other people.

In Tamara's case, the bill was $125 for a dental cleaning and a prescription in 1992. In another student's case, the bill was $40 for a dental cleaning last year that he had all but forgotten about until the other day when he went to his work study job at the library and was told that he was no longer employed there, because he was no longer a student at UMass.

Tamara has already missed two paid days at her work study job because of her abrupt and involuntary withdrawal. That's two paid days that would have put her $65 away from paying her delinquent bill.

There were, of course, written warnings from Health Services that got pushed aside with the pressure of a full course schedule and an intensive part-time job. But no one ever bothered to call her and let her know just how serious the consequences of not paying her bills would be.

"I never take those notices too seriously until they catch and say, 'Yo, you're out of here if you don't pay,'" she said yesterday.

A visit to Health Services produced no sympathy from the service on campus that would appear to be going bankrupt by their merciless slaughter of students who owed seemingly petty amounts. When Tamara asked a worker there if her failure to pay meant that she would definitely, in no uncertain terms, be withdrawn, she was told, "No, you won't be withdrawn. You already have been withdrawn."

Tamara is a senior B.D.I.C. major now. For the past three years, she has tried to pay her bills on time, go to classes and work to support herself. But now, having squeezed enough money out of her in the form of three years worth of tuition, the University seems content to spit her out over a measly little bill that seemed to be of no concern to Health Services for over two years.

What happened to the days when you would be warned about the consequences of failing to pay your bill before you sacrificed seven weeks and half a semester studying? What happened to the common courtesy of picking up the phone and saying, "Hey, remember that dental cleaning and prescription you got two years ago? Well, you still haven't paid for it and we'd really appreciate it if you could make some kind of arrangement to take care of it."

Credit card companies who deal with tens of thousands more clients than our University will do it for delinquent card holders. Rental offices give you fair warning when you are about to be evicted because you are late with your rent, and even the U.S. Government is known to give people a break when they establish systems to allow people to pay off court fees. And none of the above listed institutions would take away your job if you failed to pay. It just doesn't make sound business sense.

For now she will continue to go to classes and try to find another job to pay off the pesky bill. That is, she will continue to go to classes until they change the locks on her dorm room and send her away for good.

Who knows. Maybe your the next person to be the principle character in this little tale about a University that is willing to treat you as a number and not a person for a mere $125.

Seat belts actually do save lives

As I was driving my car yesterday down Route 9, the car in front of me suddenly stopped short to allow a pedestrian to cross the street. I had to slam on my brakes in order to prevent a collision. My slow reaction was due to the irresponsibility of the driver in front of me: her brake lights did not work.

I was lucky. She was lucky. All the other cars behind me were lucky. My parents were lucky. The police and ambulances were lucky. Why? Because my head didn't go through the windshield. I was wearing my seat belt.

This is not the first time that my seat belt has saved my beautiful face from getting plastered all over my dashboard. But what most people don't realize is that my seat belt has not only helped me, but lots of other people as well.

Seat belts can reduce the chance of drivers from getting killed or seriously injured when in a car accident. That is why Question 2 should be approved.

According to an article in the Oct. 26 issue of The Boston Globe, there were 334 motor vehicle occupants who died in accidents last year in Massachusetts. In 99 of those cases, it was not certain if seat belts were used. But of the remaining 235, a large portion of the victims, 192, were not wearing a seat belt.

How does a seat belt go beyond saving the individual? Well allow me to ask you this question: have you ever been in a traffic jam because the police, fire, and ambulance had to come to remove a driver from his/her vehicle? It's a pretty scary scene. The occupants of the wrecked vehicle(s) are usually seriously injured or in critical condition.

But let's look at this common incident from a greedy point of view. Forget about the bruised and bloody victims. What about you? Don't you hate traffic jams? What about the police, fire and ambulance crews? I think they have better matters to take care of besides peeling someone's face off their dashboard. These horrible catastrophes can be prevented. If the victims wore their seat belts, they probably would not have gotten seriously injured. Therefore, they could maybe pull their cars over to the side thus preventing a heavy traffic jam. Ambulances don't have to go to the scene and police may not have to either. This has happened to me before. It was on Route 93 in Boston. All the cars that were behind me should thank my seat belt.

Finally, how about the state? Did you know that if Question 2 is approved the state will save money from safety education expenditures? Insurance premiums may be cut as well. That would be more money in the pockets of motorists.

A common argument against the seat belt law is that it restricts personal freedom and that everybody has a right to choose to wear a seat belt or not.

I don't think so.

Operating a motor vehicle is a privilege, not a right. A right is something that everyone is allowed to exercise, such as speech or voting. But not everyone is allowed to drive. As we all know, individuals must pass a road test. And when driving, we have to abide by the traffic laws. Failure to do so may lead to the loss of your driving privileges.

We don't have the right to operate a vehicle, we have the privilege. And like privileges, you have to obey the rules that come with it.

Wearing a seat belt doesn't hurt you either. If you say that it affects your driving abilities because it's "in the way," then you're probably not good enough to be driving anyway. A seat belt doesn't affect your eyes, ears, arms, hands or feet.

The privilege of operating a vehicle is like the privilege of riding a roller coaster. Do you think that the amusement park cares about your personal safety? Maybe. But they care about the larger picture. They don't want your body to be flying out of the roller coaster and getting all mangled up on the tracks. That one person ruins it for the park and for everyone else. The ride has to be shut down, the body and tracks cleaned off, and money is spent.

Do us a favor, wear the seat belt.

Letters to the Editor

More light needs to be shed

To the editor:

What Americans know of the Bosnian conflict is based upon information given to us solely by an untrustworthy media. Its arrogance is so great that rarely does it even consult with international journalists lines reporting more accurate news. The result is that Americans are being persuaded to side against the Serbs, and even though there may be reason for that, how can we say it's entirely justifiable? How can we say that when we know so little about the situation at hand?

When I read of the conflict between Andrej Mucic, a student of Serbian decent, and Abdul Kanaan, a Muslim student who spent three months in Bosnia working with the Red Cross, I came to the conclusion that I needed to know more about the war there. I didn't understand why Kanaan was so offended by Mucic's remarks. Even less did I understand why he chose to take disciplinary and judicial action.

Then the more I thought about it, the more I thought what a perfect vehicle this would be to broaden student's understanding of the Balkan conflict by bringing the debate public. Here we have two students who are so fumed by each other's political dispositions that they are willing lash it out in front of UMass officials. So why not ask them to do it in front of UMass students?

Quite frankly I would like to know exactly what Mucic meant by, "Stop the Sudan's Holocaust. . ." As I am equally curious to know what it was about Kanaan's shirt that offended him so much. What is the relationship between Sudan and Serbia? What prompted Mucic to label himself a "Holocaust expert?" And at a time where discussion is a more viable solution to punishment, why didn't Kanaan propose to open a dialogue between them?

If they would only come forward to speak of the subject at length, we would understand the offenses, and learn more about one of the most troubled regions on earth.

Attention graduating seniors: relax

Caleb Cochran

The inevitable questions have already begun. "What are you going to do next year?" "What are you going to do with an English degree?" "What are you going to do with your life?"

Well, odd as it may seem, the fall of my senior year has arrived and I have yet to sense the doom that the people around me are forecasting. I'm not exactly sure what I'm going to do upon graduating. So what. One thing I'm not going to do, however, is sit around and panic about not trying to find a job.

I don't plan on sitting around bitching and moaning about the lack of jobs available or the lack of opportunities for liberal arts majors either. No one held a gun to my head and told me to become an English major. I'm ready to pay the consequences (or reap the benefits) of my choice, and I have trouble with those who aren't able to handle the ramifications of their choice of major.

I knew when I was a freshman that I wasn't going to step into a $50,000 a year position out of college with an English major, and I accepted that. I still do. Money is not my motivation. If it were, I would be panicking about what to do with my life. As it stands now, however, I feel like a have a world of opportunity open to me.

I've started the requisite job search and resume polishing process, as many seniors have. I finally made my way up to Mather Career Center this year, and have been very pleased with the personal attention that I have received there. Many helpful folks have helped me with the job search process. I'm making the effort to try and learn all I can about what kinds of opportunities I will have after I graduate.

After I graduate, I realize that I may not have a job waiting for me. Not many of us will. So why get in a tizzy over this realization? I'm 22 years old. If I end up working for an average number of years, I'll retire when I'm 65. That leaves me with 43 years of work ahead of me. That's almost twice my current lifetime. I think a brief reprieve is in order before I head off to the salt mine for the rest of my life.

There's nothing wrong with a little transition time between college and work. Many people fail to realize this. If they aren't going to be in grad school or at a real job next fall, they're going to consider themselves failures. That's unfortunate. Working in a small bakery/grocery store in my hometown for the last two summers has taught me as much about how to deal with people as college has. The job doesn't exactly have a lot of upward mobility, but I've learned some things by working there which I can carry on to my next job, whatever that may be. Like I say, I'm not too worried.

Before you dismiss my attitude as flippant or apathetic, let me clarify a bit. I do eventually want to have a respectable and well-paying career in a field I enjoy. We all do. But the realistic truth is that this isn't going to happen overnight. And despite what a lot of graduating seniors (and worse, parents) think, this is O.K.

Screw up while you still have the chance. You're young. If you want to go drive across the country next fall in the beat up old jalopy that you've been babying for the past four years, why not do it? What's stopping you? You're not a failure if you take a year to get yourself together before proceeding with the rest of your life. You're normal.

So, seniors, before you go jump off a bridge because you don't have plans for next semester, take a moment to reflect. In about seven months, you'll be a college graduate. That's pretty impressive. If you want to burn around for a summer or a year before you go on to conquer the world, don't be afraid to do it. Remember, you've got 43 more years of work ahead of you.

Pillowcases and toilet paper: remembering Halloweens past

Stupid masks, pillow cases, eggs, toilet paper, soap, free candy and a crisp autumn night, put them all together and they equal a holiday that is the frequently overlooked starting gate to the holiday season.

It's Halloween, and while other holidays tend to mean basically the same thing to everyone, Halloween is one of those holidays that becomes what you make of it. And depending on your neighborhood, Oct. 31 could have been synonymous with numerous different things.

The most prominent thing about Halloween for most had to be the candy. Let's face it, at 10-years-old there isn't much more in your life that is more important than candy. If there is candy involved, you're there. Even though candy was free on Halloween, there was a system involved.

MIKE'S Mental STEW —by Mike Maclean

First, you had to get the buzz on who had the good stuff, Hershey Bars and Reese's Peanut Butter Cups were always a good draw. Almond Joy's and Mounds usually seemed to be the ones that you tried to stay away from, but ended up with a stack of them that night anyway. Good N' Plenty's were probably the worst, the name was a half-contradiction, because the weren't good, but you sure got plenty of 'em.

The houses that didn't give out candy were the worst though. Some of the dreadful things that ended up in the bottom of bags were things like pennies, gift certificates to places like McDonald's and Friendly's and . . . the greatest treat of all for a little kid...fruit? Who's the sick puppy that decided that the thing a little kid wants more than anything on Halloween is fruit? Hey, why not just give the little tyke a tube of toothpaste while you're at it?

These people were the ones we all used to visit twice during the night, once to make the discovery of what they had, the second to launch some sort of projectile at their house. This usually entailed eggs, shaving cream and toilet paper, but once police decided to start giving out fines for each toiletry discovered on your person, so other alternatives had to be developed.

Some of these other options included water balloons, soap and, in later years, paint guns.

These were all O.K., but there was just a certain mystique about throwing a roll of toilet paper over a telephone wire and setting it on fire that couldn't be achieved by soaping a window or two.

At the end of the night, if you made it back without the aid of a police cruiser, came the ritual of having the parents check the candy. It probably frustrated many kids, not being able to dig in right away, but now we can all probably understand our parents' fear. After all, they were sending their children out door to door after dark, and after a couple of razor blades were found in apples a while back, their nerves resembled that of Jell-O.

When it was finally time to chow down, everything got spread out on the floor, separated and inventoried. Most of the candy was eaten in the first two weeks (If you were one of those people who brought two masks and went to each house twice you probably had enough to last until Christmas).

The next day in school, everyone brought their extra stuff to try and trade for better candy. Smarties were usually worth less cause they were small but they packed a punch (pure sugar usually does). Everyone would tell their stories from the previous night, like who's mailbox got blown up or who fell for the "mystery flaming bag" on the front step trick.

But eventually we would all start looking forward to Thanksgiving, and the only thing to remember Halloween by would be a bag filled with Almond Joys, stuffed in your closet or under your bed, just waiting to give your mom a surprise around Springtime.

Maysles works with Stones for new film

By Mary Campbell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — "When you make a film of real life," says documentary filmmaker Albert Maysles, "people can't dismiss it and say, 'Well, it's only a film.'

"When you're filming, you're catching much more than you can grasp at any moment. It is not makebelieve. Every time you see it, you pick up more and more things you hadn't seen before."

One of Maysles' films certainly included a slice of real life — or real death — and there was no makebelieve about it. It was the memorable scene in his Rolling Stones concert documentary Gimme Shelter which showed a man with a knife stabbing to death a man with a gun.

"I have rarely met anybody who has seen Gimme Shelter who hadn't seen it two or three times," he says.

That was 25 years ago, and now Maysles has returned to the real life of the Rolling Stones to make a new film of the enduring British rock group.

The Stones' first record album was released 30 years ago and today, as the group announced on Oct. 3, its current 60-date tour in North America is the highest grossing music tour of all time.

Since there's still all that interest, VH-1 engaged Maysles to shoot a half-hour film which will air starting Oct. 27: Conversations with the Rolling Stones. It was shot July 12 in Toronto, where the Stones were rehearsing for the Aug. 1 to Dec. 18 tour, titled "Voodoo Lounge."

Conversations, of course promises no episode so stunning as the killing scene in Gimme Shelter so VH-1 will show that film with the new one.

Reminiscing in the office of Maysles Films Inc. here, the 67-year-old Maysles recalled with clarity the origins of Gimme Shelter which he produced with his brother, David, who died in 1987.

It was a free film of the Stones' Dec. 7, 1969, concert in Altamont, Calif. At the moment of the stabbing The Stones were performing the song, "Under My Thumb." Maysles says most people recall, erroneously, that the song was the perhaps more fitting "Sympathy for the Devil," about mankind itself rather than Satan being responsible for tragedies of history.)

Maysles recalls that a cinematographer suggested there might be a film in the Stones' 1969 tour. The Maysles brothers decided it was worth a look, met with the group, and went to a concert in Baltimore.

"We thought there was a music film for sure and we had a hunch it would be more than that," he said.

Mommyheads set for Baystate on Sat.

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Every once in a while a band comes along that goes against the grain of current trends, and in the process comes up with something original as well as beautiful. For the past six years San Francisco's The Mommyheads have been one of those bands.

Laboring almost entirely in obscurity for the duration of their career, The Mommyhead's off-kilter style of pop may just be one of the music world's best kept secrets.

The band is currently on a 55-date national tour (without any label support) that will bring them to The Bay State Cabaret in Northampton this Saturday, Oct. 29. This will mark the first time that the band has come to the Valley.

Originating in the late 80s, the band began writing insanely unconventional pop songs that hinted at the musical depth that would later surface in their music. Soon after they graduated from high school they recorded their debut album Acorn, a quirky collage of hooks, odd tempos, and out an out bizarreness.

"That's what was going through my head when I was eighteen," jokes lead vocalist/guitarist Adam Cohen, the band's principle songwriter.

After a series of personal switches, the band recorded its follow-up, and first proper release, Coming Into Beauty for the hip Virginia-based Simple Machines label. The album managed to harness all the best elements of Acorn and presented them in a more comprehensible, and somewhat more mature manner.

Taking this growing process one step further, the band has released their latest effort, an extended EP entitled Flying Suit. The EP focuses more on the songwriting skills that the band prides themselves on.

"I like to think of us as a songwriting band," says Cohen. "I'll bring in a song structure and then the rest of band will work on it."

While the band's music has progressively been heading in a more straight-forward direction, the eight songs that make up Flying Suit are far from typical. The album is a virtual pop masterpiece, always twisting and turning when least expected.

While their name may not ring a bell to most, The Mommyhead's show this Saturday should prove to be one of the finest musical displays showcased in the Valley this semester. Their intricate blend of musical chops and pop sensibilities will be sure to appeal to music fans of all spectrums.

The Mommyheads will play at the Bay State Cabaret this Saturday, Oct. 29. The show is 21+. Call the Bay State Hotel for ticket price and time.

The other day I met with some friends from high school for dinner. They were bragging about this and that. Going on and on and on. "Oh, yes, Buffy and I are keeping quite busy with our Machiavellian Concepts Book Club, so much so that we have little time to devote to directing the Ivy League Barbershop Quartet which we currently created on a complete and utter whim." I sat with a complacent smile, forking down my sesame tofu surprise. Without bragging, I knew in my heart I was light years ahead of these snobs. I write for

Wanda waited night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had seduced the man in the yellow hat and had commandeered the Prince of Malawi's limo, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with...

Question 1 limits spending on referendums

Corporate funding may face restrictions

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Question 1 on the ballot this November asks voters whether spending limits should be imposed on ballot campaigns funded by corporate capital.

Massachusetts has passed strict campaign finance laws, but unlimited corporate spending is allowed on ballot questions.

In recent ballot elections, opposing campaigns for several controversial issues have used heavy funding from corporate sources to advertise a position on issues, giving the opponents a monetary advantage over supporters.

For example, in 1992, the Plastics and Paper Lobby contributed 99 percent of the $6.3 million used to defeat a recycling initiative that year.

What Question 1 aims to do, if passed in the Nov. 8 election, is to prevent corporations — large and small, from making contributions to ballot campaigns from their general treasuries. This includes non-profit organizations which are heavily dependent on corporate funding.

Question 1 is also designed to increase the public disclosure by requiring contributions made late in a campaign amount over $1,000 to be reported within one business day of the donation.

The supporters of Question 1 claim it will curtail corporate sponsored elections which represent the demands of a few wealthy businesses.

Opponents of Question 1 claim it curtails the First Amendment rights of all business owners — large and small.

"When we come up against a $6 million budget compared with our half million, you can see how hard it would be to get our message out," said Shannon Raborn, a MASSPIRG organizer at the University of Massachusetts. "Question 1 makes it an even playing field."

MASSPIRG, a student-run group which lobbies for environmental issues and consumer rights, has been campaigning for Question 1 since they collected the over 80,000 signatures needed to put an initiative on the Massachusetts ballot.

The flip side of Question 1 is the effect it would have on all business owners. Gina Addis, spokesperson for the "No on 1" committee said, "Our issue with Question 1 is that it prohibits businesses, large and small, from defending themselves when their interests are at stake.

"This means a neighborhood grocery store, hospitals, colleges, cannot spend their own resources on issues that are their own interests — and that's crazy."

"At first glance Question 1 looks logical. Our job is to educate voters as to what it will really do," said Addis. "When voters are presented with both sides of the story they usually end up on the no side."

According to Addis, the "No on 1" committee has only been campaigning for about two months; she said the committee started their campaigning behind the work already done by the supporters of the initiative.

"It is a First Amendment issue," said Addis. "MASSPIRG has worded this so it looks like it's all big businesses. That's anything but the truth."

"I think [Romney's] got a lot of great new ideas," said Morrish. "And it's time for a change."

A Kennedy supporter, Phil Shapiro of Amherst, said he was voting for the democrat because of his experience in office.

"I'm tired of these really rich businessmen coming into politics," said Shapiro. "I don't think they know what's best for the country."

Another Kennedy supporter, Barry Walker from Medford, said he did not like Romney's stand on domestic issues.

"As a person of color I have no choice but to vote for Kennedy," said Walker. "He's been there, and his record shows that he's able."

After the debates, many people interviewed in the auditorium said they thought Romney was more successful.

"It seemed that Romney was more into it, more relaxed," said Patricia Lecko of Easthampton. "But I won't decide until election day."

Craig Camerlan of Springfield said he was pro-Romney walking into the debate, but changed his mind in the end.

"You could tell that Kennedy was the senior statesman," said Camerlan. "When Romney was confronted with a tough issue, he seemed to attack Kennedy. Romney just resorted to low blows."

Collegian staff member Jessica Taverna contributed to this article.

■ question 6

Nancy Folbre. "There are no negative economic effects [of a graduated income tax] that I can see."

While both sides agree the tax level will not increase for the vast majority of businesses, critics say those who would have higher taxes will be the firms making the most money and creating jobs.

Supporters of the tax say that the tax will result in 82 percent of businesses seeing lower taxes, and that this tax will actually stimulate the Massachusetts economy.

The tax will put $600 million in the pockets of the middle and lower classes, according to Braude, and this money will be spent "quickly and locally."

Opponents say it is not completely fair to penalize a person by making them pay more in taxes just because they have been successful. Supporters say the only fair way of distributing wealth is to have those who can afford to pay more do so.

Expectations remain high for Rene Ingoglia

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Weekly expectations of University of Massachusetts running back Rene Ingoglia are high — 100 yards high.

It was nearly four weeks ago that the junior fullback rushed for a Yankee Conference and Massachusetts record 313 yards on 28 carries in the Oct. 1 Homecoming game against Rhode Island, reaching a four-game total of 765 yards [191 per game]. The last three weeks? Games of 72, 68 and 86, totaling 226 yards [75.1 per game].

The sudden plunge in yardage totals for the Rochester, N.Y., native has possible scattered reasons: special defensive attacks of clogging up the middle, where the bulk of his running goes, better defensive fronts in the last three games compared to the first four, failure of execution by the entire Minuteman offense — all have a decent claim to the cause of Ingoglia's recent slump.

Total team effort is apparent in both his big games and disappointing ones.

"It's a team effort," said Ingoglia. "Just like when I get 200 yards in a game, when I get only 80 yards, it has to do with the total team effort. As of late, we just haven't been clicking."

To say that Ingoglia's running totals reflect Massachusetts' outcome each game would be rather inaccurate. When the Minutemen lost to Richmond 14–13 in the first game of the season, Ingoglia rushed for 129 yards on 14 carries. When the Minutemen upset William & Mary 23–14 two weekends ago, Ingoglia carried the ball 23 times for a season-low 68 yards. Needless to say, Ingoglia's yardage doesn't necessarily produce a win or loss.

To say that it is necessary to put the ball in Ingoglia's hands as many times as possible is an understatement. Coach Mike Hodges understands the importance of giving the ball to the Walter Camp Award/All-America candidate.

"We need to get him the football more," said Hodges, discussing the 52–14 defeat at the hands of Delaware last week. "He had 21 carries, but many of them were in the second half. We have to balance it out more. Whether it is at fullback or tailback, we need to get the most out of him."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

junior fullback Rene Ingoglia [19], an All-America candidate and leading Yankee Conference rusher, leads the University of Massachusetts football team tomorrow afternoon as it hosts Boston University.

Ingoglia, whose 991 yards thus far has added to the 2,932 compiled on the ground in his two-plus seasons at Massachusetts, sees a difference from last year to this season, especially in his approach to each game.

"Last year was somewhat different, I would just go out and play," said Ingoglia. "This year is a bit different, I'm almost expected to [run for over 100 yards each game]."

Despite the decreasing of game yardage totals, Ingoglia is still having an outstanding season. The rushing leader in the YanCon and fourth in the nation with 141.6 yards per game, Ingoglia has found the end-zone nine times thus far this year.

The changes? The production has somewhat fallen in the last few weeks, and the expectations have risen to a higher level. As for Ingoglia, the recent on-goings have yet to phase him, and he is interested in one thing — winning.

"If the team is going to win because I run for 100 yards, than I gotta' do it," said Ingoglia.

"Rene plays to win," said Hodges. "When he got 300 yards, people thought it was going to happen all the time. Unless it's ridiculous competition, it's just not going to happen.

"One thing about Rene is it's not just the yardage, he's a team player. Even if he gains three yards, he doesn't care as long as we come out with a win."

Hodges then paused, and added, "we're not going to win if Rene runs for three yards."

Ingoglia gaining three yards in Saturday's game against Boston University at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium [12:30 p.m.] would be less than favorable for Massachusetts as it has manifested into an all-important game.

As for Ingoglia, he recognizes that this game is important for many reasons, one that includes an intra-state battle.

"It's for bragging rights," said Ingoglia. "They're in Boston and we're the state university. We're pumped up."

Key A-10 game ahead for UMass field hockey

By Mike Pinder
Collegian Staff

Great teams rise to overcome adversity.

The No. 5 nationally ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey team will try to do just that when it plays host to Atlantic 10 foe St. Joseph's on Saturday at Totman Field.

The Minutewomen will attempt to bounce back against the Hawks after suffering only their second loss of the season, a 1–0 setback at the hands of the No. 8 nationally ranked Connecticut Huskies.

UMass Coach Megan Donnelly said she expects the Minutewomen to be pumped up for the St. Joseph's match– up due to the fact that it will be UMass's last conference game of the year and that they are coming off a heartbreaking double overtime loss to UConn.

"The players always get very motivated for the conference games," said Donnelly. "I think that they are going to be ready to go for many reasons, but also because they want to get this UConn taste out of their mouths."

Donnelly and the rest of the Minutewoman field hockey team will try to record a decisive showing against the Hawks to propel themselves into next weekend's Atlantic 10 tournament in Philadelphia. The Hawks will look to record the upset to improve their seed in the tournament as well.

"This game is very important for us to get our timing and our rhythm going and to get everyone involved in the offense," said Donnelly. "We need to determine the tone and the pace of the game."

> "[The Hawks] are good at converting and taking advantage of other teams' errors, and that's always a dangerous team."

When it comes to the A–10, the Minutewomen have controlled the majority of play, outscoring their conference foes, 5–1.

St. Joseph's comes into the game with a 12–4–1 overall record, [1–1–0 in the Atlantic 10] and are sporting a six game winning streak.

The Hawks are a deceptively dangerous team with a balanced scoring attack. St. Joe's boasts four players with five goals or more.

Dani Bleam, Melanie Taube and Hayley Davidson all lead the Hawks with 16 points apiece. Bleam has tallied five goals while assisting on six others. Taube and Davidson both check in with six goals and four assists.

"St. Joe's is very aggressive, very scrappy and very opportunistic," said Donnelly. "They are good at converting and taking advantage of other teams errors, and that's always a dangerous team."

The Hawks become an even more dangerous team if the Minutewomen do not spread the field out.

In games against less talented foes, the Minutewomen tend not to spread the field. This fact is evident in the tying of both Rutgers and Syracuse and also in the loss to powerful UConn.

Donnelly has indicated that she is a bit worried about her teams occasional inability to spread the field, but says that the problem is being addressed.

"I'm concerned about our team not spreading the field," Donnelly said. "At UConn it seemed as though we used about five square yards of the field, but we've taken care of that in practice and I think we'll see a wide open game."

Hockey hits ice to battle Providence and BC on road

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

In its first game of the season, the University of Massachusetts hockey team was like a little kid getting to drive Dad's car. In control for a few moments, but then back to reality.

The Minutemen naturally do not want to be served up again as ninth-place fodder for Providence and Boston College this weekend, when they will be the first foes on those schools' Hockey East schedules.

A major change in UMass' lineup will be the promotion of freshman right wing Chris Fawcett to the first line, where he replaces injured BC transfer Sal Manganaro, who broke his kneecap versus UMass–Lowell and is out indefinitely.

"We're really looking forward to this weekend," Massachusetts Coach Joe Mallen said. "It's another opportunity for us to match up with Hockey East teams and see how we stand."

Providence entertains Mallen's troops tomorrow at 7 p.m. in cozy Schneider Arena (capacity 3,030), and Paul Pooley's Friars are sure to be hungry following an 8–0 dismantling at the hands of powerful Vermont, PC's largest margin of defeat in six years.

"After getting beat 8–0, you don't look past anyone," Pooley said. "[UMass] is a big challenge for us."

Providence got off to a good start, recording a 6–3 win over Army on Oct. 21. That victory was Pooley's first as a head coach, after three years as an assistant at Lake Superior State. It ended an 11–game winless streak (0–9–2) for the Friars that dated back to January 29.

Providence is one of the more experienced teams in the league, with 21 returning lettermen from a squad that went 14–19–3 (9–12–3 in HE, 5th) in 1993–94. The best of the returnees is first team All–Hockey East center Chad Quenneville, a diminutive star (5–foot–8, 160 pounds) from the Pioneer Valley (South Hadley). The speedy playmaker tallied 22 goals and added 18 assists last season, and has a goal and an assist this year.

"I knew what a great offensive player [Quenneville] is, but I've been surprised by how good he is defensively," Pooley said. "I stress creating offense from defense, so that's been a real bonus. He's just a gifted player."

Providence has another veteran forward, Joe Hulbig, who has yet to prove why he was a first round NHL Draft selection two years ago (13th overall–Edmonton), one of only two in the league (Boston University freshman defenseman Jeff Koally, the 22nd overall choice by Quebec in '94, is the other). Hulbig has scored just nine goals in two years, and the rugged, 6–foot–3–inch, 215–pound left winger will have to do a lot more than that if he is to ever make the jump to the NFL.

"I'm very disappointed in the power play [against Lowell]," Mallen said. "But that was my fault, not the players.'" The Minutemen concentrated on their power play at Thursday's practice.

On Sunday, the Minutemen will head north to Chestnut Hill, home of the Boston College Eagles, whom they play at 7 p.m. BC is 1–0–1, having tied New Brunswick 3–3 before pasting Army 9–3. First year head coach Jerry York seeks to right a proud college hockey tradition that suffered harsh scrutiny following the chaotic hiring and departure of Mike Milbury.

Rink Notes: Goalie Dave Kilduff made the start for Mallen in the season opener. Freshman Brian Regan dressed, while Rich Moriarty was scratched. Mallen said to expect more than one goalie in back-to-back Hockey East games.

Minutemen go for first-ever A-10 title

By Brian Gormley
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team can win its first ever Atlantic 10 regular season championship if it beats St. Bonaventure tomorrow at Richard F. Garber Field at 3 p.m.

The Minutemen (10–5–1) face a St. Bonaventure team that is tied with Temple for last place in the Atlantic 10, but Massachusetts Coach Sam Koch said St. Bonaventure is a team that will play hard the entire game.

"St. Bonaventure is young, they have a couple of excellent frontrunners, they play very direct and they are physical," Koch said. "They are out of the tournament, so they have nothing to play for except pride and a chance to knock us off and keep us from winning the regular season championship. And that is definitely going to be a motivating factor when they come here Friday."

Koch said although he thinks St. Bonaventure has improved since the beginning of the season, when they lost to James Madison, 10–1, the game is the hands of the Minutemen.

"I'm much more concerned about us than I am about them. We have full control of the outcome," he said. "If we give them space to move the ball, it will be a game. But if we defend the way that we can and don't let them find their targets and don't give them time to settle the ball we should control the game and the outcome."

One area of concern for Koch, however, is that this will be Massachusetts' third game in the past six days. He is worried that his players will not be as fresh as St. Bonaventure's.

"I think this being our third game in the past six days will definitely be a factor on our play," he said. "We have a number of players who are tired. We have been doing a lot of traveling without much chance to recover. Can we suck it up and do it again? We have so far, but sooner or later the well will be dry."

There will be little rest after this game. Massachusetts plays Sunday on the road against Philadelphia Textile.

"Philadelphia Textile will be no picnic," Koch said. "There is a huge revenge factor for them in that game because we beat them 8–0 the year before. But we are going to take it one game at a time. They don't exist right now."

One advantage the Minutemen will have is that forward Dave Siljanovski will be back in action. Siljanovski had to sit out Tuesday's game against Holy Cross because he was serving a one–game suspension for acquiring five yellow cards this season.

Koch said this kind of game is the most difficult to prepare for because St. Bonaventure is capable of beating any team, even though they have 15 losses this season.

"St. Bonaventure has had a tough year, but I know that there is nothing St. Bonaventure wants more than to beat us tomorrow," Koch said. "It would make their season. We have got to be prepared."

Koch said he will be able to tell which team has come to play right at the start of the game tomorrow.

"The first 15 minutes will tell a lot as far as how each team will play and how each team will allow each other to play," he said. "We definitely need to be focused if we are going to be successful. We can't look at St. Bonaventure's record. They have some good young players and they have scored some goals on some good teams."

From the goalmouth: If the Minutemen capture the regular season A-10 title, it would be Massachusetts' first trip to the post-season since 1992. That season, Koch's squad advanced all the way to the finals, beating host Rutgers 2-1 in the semi-finals, before bowing to West Virginia in the championship. UMass has never made it to the NCAAs, the reward for winning the A-10 tourney.

Minutewomen in Head of Schuylkill

Women's crew returns to water after placing 21st in Boston

By Jody King
Collegian Staff

Last Saturday the University of Massachusetts women's crew team competed in the toughest race of its first varsity season.

The Minutewomen entered two boats in the championship eights women's division of the 30th Annual Head of the Charles Regatta in Cambridge, MA. The regatta, an all–day event on the Charles River, draws more than 250,000 spectators annually and is the largest single–day rowing event in the world.

The championship eight race is an open race, meaning that there is no restriction on the rowers or scullers who can enter. Because of this, the Minutewomen were pitted against tough competition, including the USA women's national team, a few championship teams, and mostly Division I collegiate teams.

"Rowing in the Head of the Charles is an honor. It was definitely the toughest competition we've had or will have to race," UMass stroke Tara Longpre said.

"The boats were all very competitive. It was a fast race, and racing in front of millions of people makes it so much more exciting."

The UMass varsity entry started 35th of 36 boats in the race and pulled ahead over the course of the winding river to finish 21st in a time of 17:30.18.

The second UMass boat, entered in the regatta under the name of the Thames River Sculls from Connecticut, started in the 26th spot and finished 34th in a time of 18:15.50.

In relation to some of the crews that the Minutewomen were looking to be competitive with, UMass' varsity eight crew finished somewhere in between.

Boston University's crew, which had finished less than 1 second behind UMass in an earlier head race, finished two spots, and :02 ahead of the UMass boat, while Dartmouth, who finished before the Minutewomen in the Head of the Connecticut, finished behind UMass at 29th with a :33 gap.

The first place collegiate finisher in the race was Yale, finishing second in a time of 16:36.13. The Minutewomen had beaten Yale earlier this fall by three slots and a little less than :20 in a head race in the Head of the Connecticut Regatta.

"It is a good experience to row against these crews. Radcliffe, Brown, Princeton. They all have fast boats," UMass Coach Jim Dietz said.

The Minutewomen are eagerly awaiting the christening of their new blades, which still need to be painted with the UMass colors. The rowers were in full crew fashion last Saturday, having real uniforms for the first time. UMass could be seen from the riverbank wearing their new team unisuits emblazoned with the UMass maroon and white with a black cross stripe.

"We used to just all wear the same t–shirts and shorts," UMass rower Amy Kenney said. When asked if it made a difference to the new varsity team, Kenney said, "if it did, I didn't notice, I was concentrating on the race."

The team returns to the water tomorrow in Philadelphia for the Head of the Schuylkill Regatta.

"I think I'm the only one in the boat who wasn't there last year, and I'm really excited. I can't wait. I've heard that it should be a good competition," Kenney said.

UMass has competed well in the Schuylkill Regatta before as a club, and expectations for this year's varsity crew are high.

Williams, UMass fall to Boston University

Despite a fine effort, Tony Williams [pictured] and the Minutemen dropped a 28-24 decision Saturday afternoon (See Sports, page 10).

Greeks come through for Newman Center

Shades of Gray

David Gray's latest album, Flesh, is just one of the albums that is featured in this week's Trax On Trax Off section (See Arts and Living, page 5).

Smoke-in provides new perspectives about marijuana

Hampshire College HEMP gathering offers information

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Over 100 people sat on the lawn at Hampshire College Friday afternoon, some of them smoking pot — and the police did not bother them.

The "smoke-in," a gathering organized by the Hampshire Marijuana Project (HEMP) was held on the lawn outside the Hampshire College library.

Participants sat on the lawn in groups talking, listening to a band playing on a stage assembled on the lawn.

Some were smoking pot, but most smoking cigarettes. The atmosphere in general was laid back.

Venessa Lindberg, an undeclared Hampshire College freshman, said, "The theme [of the smoke-in] isn't to get high. It's to get information."

HEMP President Dylan Ruediger, a literature and political science major and Hampshire College sophomore, said he was not expecting trouble in the course of the smoke-in.

The police were notified before the event of what would take place, but there were no police officers visibly present at the smoke-in.

There was a sign welcoming participants to the smoke-in which illustrated a marijuana leaf with the words "medicine, food, fuel and fiber" surrounding it. The sign also read "Legalize Hemp" in large letters.

"[Marijuana] is relaxing. It helps me to focus," said Lindberg. "It makes you realize where you stand. It gives you a new perspective."

The smoke-in lasted about two hours, starting at "high" noon while people enjoyed the warm weather.

Hemp-made jewelry was sold and literature was distributed to explain the uses of hemp.

While the general attitude was relaxed, the atmosphere became political when people got on stage and addressed the crowd. There was talk of the war on drugs in the United States.

Brian Julin, vice-president of the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) addressed the crowd from the stage.

"Without action belief is just thought," Julin said. "This smoke-in is action because it is a demonstration."

The only commotion at the smoke-in was the seventh annual floss-in run by the Hampshire College based Kakistocratic Aquatic Group Flippantly Lathering Overly Rubicund Thongs (KAGFLORT), a comic relief group.

Touting signs such as "To Brush is Not Enough," and quoting such facts as "100 percent of all non-flossers eventually die," the floss-in was a humorous departure from the smoke-in.

HEMP has been in operation for "a little less than one school year" according to HEMP president, Dylan Ruediger, a literature and political science major and Hampshire College sophomore.

There are 162 HEMP members on the Hampshire College campus and 256 members in total, said Mark Clifton, a creative writing and political science major, and a founding member of HEMP.

Lance Brown, also of the CRC, compared the prohibition of cannabis to the prohibition of alcohol that took place in the United States between 1920 and 1933.

The general attitude of the smoke-in participants was marijuana should be legalized.

"People treat [marijuana] like drinking a beer," Lindberg said, "It's much more of a mind thing. It's not something to be thrown around or taken advantage of."

Phone victims told to report harassing calls

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

It is 2 a.m. The phone rings.

"I'm gonna kill you, faggot!" snarls a voice at the end of the line.

You jump back under your covers, afraid that your life is in danger, afraid you have been found out, afraid that you have got no one to turn to.

Dilemma faced by many students

Here at UMass, this scenario is not unfamiliar. Every day of the semester, several students — gay, bisexual and straight — receive threatening, homophobic phone calls. And if not phone calls, then they are harassed in person or passed nasty notes such as, "Watch out, dyke!" Sometimes they are physically threatened, and other times they find their dorm rooms or cars vandalized.

For some students, reporting these incidents presents a difficult dilemma. On the one hand, they want to stop the violence, see the attackers punished, and feel safe to live their lives.

On the other hand, coming forward to authorities may involve some serious personal risk. Reporting these incidents may force people in the closet to come out as gay or bisexual. Straight people who are victims must risk getting labeled. Some victims may have fears about retribution by attackers or fear of the authorities themselves.

"Always, always report."

At the UMass Dean of Students Office, however, all these doubts and fears are brushed aside.

"Always, always report," urges Assistant Dean of Students Eileen Stewart.

By not reporting, says Stewart, students only make their situation worse. If incidents and crimes go unreported, then the University has

Annual Festival of Lights celebrates return of Rama

By Michelle Lugo

An exhibition of Asian clothing, a prayer ceremony, a Balinese Dance, a performance by the University Dancers, Stick Dances (Dandiya) and a myriad of other cultural activities took place during the "Festival of Lights" Sunday in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium.

The South Asian Dance & Music program at the Fine Arts Center sponsored and hosted the event on Oct. 30. An audience of around 200 gathered to watch the performances.

"The festival is a celebration of the coming back of Rama, from the Hindu epic of Ramayan. According to the story, Rama returned from 14 years of exile as the true heir of an important (Hindu) religious city. Rama had originally been exiled by one of his father's four wives who wanted her son to be King. The people of that important Hindu city celebrated Rama's return by lighting their many lamps, hence where the name came from," said Dhara Amin, a student at Mount Holyoke College and dancer in the festival.

The "Court of Heavenly Beings" was a central theme in the celebration. According to the festival's program guide in the Hindu myths, dance was first performed by celestial beings in the court of Indra (the divinity of thunder and lightening). An affected audience of Gods and Goddesses were so charmed by this presentation that they decreed: "let all mortals hereafter worshipping us include dance and music in their prayers."

There were a series of eight dances. Artistic direction was arranged by Ranjanaa Devi, a dance professor at UMass and head of the Nataraj Dance Group. The performers were students of Devi, other dancers from the Five Colleges and community dance groups. The dances required a month's rehearsal time. Each individual dance is intended to be a tribute for a particular god.

This was the second year the event has been produced. Among the changes from last year's production was the involvement of a the Five College South Asian community, not just UMass.

"There is representation here today from both students and the faculties of every campus. We even invited a group of Balinese dancers for a performance this year," said Devi.

Throughout the Lower Campus Center Concourse there was food sold from Paradise of India in Amherst, and India Palace in Northampton.

In the seminar rooms, craftsmen were selling South Asian clothing, jewelry and other artifacts. The craftsmen were invited from many places, according to Devi. After the show, a dance party took place for all those who attended the festival.

Dr. Frederick Tillis, director of the Fine Arts Center, said, "The South Asian Music and Dance program is only one of the multicultural departments of the FAC. New World, Agusta Savage Gallery, Black Musicians Conference, Jazz in July, and Bright Moments Music Festival, are the others."

'Sadhana' performance provokes angry walkout

By Pat Queen
Collegian Correspondent

Many South Asian students celebrating the "Festival of Lights" in the Campus Center Auditorium on Oct. 30 walked out indignantly after a performance by the University Dancers.

The performance was a jazz dance called "Sadhana," evoking images of devotions in the asthrams around the world. The source of controversy was the music used in the dance, a piece called "Dissidenten." To South Asians, particularly Hindus at the performance, it was a "jazzed up" version of one of their most sacred songs called "Raghu Pari Raghava Raja Ram" which is sung at Hindu temples in prayer to God.

"It is sung in praise of God and religion, and the dancers were dressed inappropriately. It is comparable to a striptease to a church hymn," said Rishi Surtani, a UMass student attending the event.

BillBob Brown, who choreographed the dance and took responsibility for selecting the music said, "I am glad it brought anger because anger brings people together. My sincere intent was to promote unity of world cultures. I support the anger. I am an artist and believe that bodies and minds flow from one culture to another. If controversy and anger are a result then that's good because it creates a dialogue between the two cultures."

Despite the controversy, the University Dancers were applauded by the majority of those who attended. Most of the audience was unaware of the song's meaning because a large percentage of the diversity of spectators were not South Asian.

Ranjanaa Devi, who was responsible for artistic direction said, "It is an assimilation of Western culture and South Asian culture."

In a reaction to this statement, UMass student Meenakshi Marwaha said, "This is a disgrace, the fact that we're here does not mean we assimilate with Western culture. Insulting our most sacred song does not assimilate the two cultures. Many of us walked out. It's taking the artistic license too far. It was a very bad representation of South Asian culture."

Several older Hindu women walked out of the Campus Center Auditorium also because they felt insulted. Some of the complaints addressed the actual choice of costume for the dance number. A group of Hindu people wanted to address the committee who organized the events for an explanation.

Suspicious incidents in Washington dorm prompt lock changes

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

All the locks in George Washington tower were changed on Thursday after a series of suspicious incidents led University of Massachusetts Housing Services to believe someone had a copy of the master key.

On Oct. 25, the police investigated a report of a missing master key in Washington. They found that the key was not missing, but thought that a duplicate of the master may have been made, according to Karin Sherbin of the UMass News Office.

On Oct. 22, an incident took place on the second floor of Washington, in which someone allegedly unlocked and opened the door of a room where someone was studying, according to Kerry Wilcox, a junior communications disorder major and Washington resident.

The resident said that he heard someone unlock the door and walk into the room, but had thought it was just his roommate, Sherbin said. The intruder ran out of the room once he realized someone was in the room.

The alleged intruder was identified as a 5-foot-6-inch blond male of medium build, about 160 lbs., Sherbin said.

The resident went to the cluster office and found that the spare key had not been taken out that night, Sherbin said.

On Oct. 26, a Washington RA reported that she found one of her posters that had originally been on her wall in the middle of her room, Sherbin said. The case was dismissed as a false report.

Later that evening, a person who had graduated from UMass was found trying to get into the back door of Washington, Sherbin said.

First he said he was trying to find a key, then he said he was actually looking for a particular RA in Washington. The name of that particular RA was checked out. There are no RAs in Washington under that name, Sherbin said.

The residents were given new keys Wednesday night and the locks were changed on Thursday, according to Bobby Banerjee, Washington's resident director.

Washington RAs were sent memos last week, telling them not to comment to the press on anything that involves the cluster office, according to Theodore Brown, a friend of one of the RAs.

It took two hours to install new cores, the central part of the locks, in 324 rooms. The cost reports are not in yet, but it should cost over $3000, according to John Findley, assistant director of housing and operations.

"Nothing was stolen and no one was hurt," Banerjee said, "but we had to insure the safety and security of our residents."

Third Quarter GNP rise triggers stock gains

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks shot higher on Friday, as interest rates sank after a hotly anticipated report on third-quarter economic activity contained no alarming signs of inflation.

The Dow Jones industrial average surged 55.51 points to 3,930.66, its best level since Oct. 19 and its biggest one-day gain since October 11. Friday's gain pushed the Dow up 39.36 for the week.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by nearly 8 to 3 on the New York Stock Exchange, where volume totaled a hefty 381.36 million shares, up from 327.77 million Thursday.

Relieved investors went on a buying spree, pushing broad-market indexes sharply higher as well.

The catalyst for the gains in both markets was a Commerce Department report on the nation's third-quarter gross domestic product, which surged 3.4 percent.

While the market had expected a more modest gain, investors were cheered to see a decline in a closely watched inflation measure tied to the GDP.

Dollar makes gains, gold prices fall

NEW YORK (AP) — The depressed dollar rallied broadly Friday in concert with stocks and bonds as the financial markets welcomed U.S. economic data depicting growth accompanied by mild inflation. Opinions differed on how much of a part the Commerce Department's third-quarter economic reading and other reports played in the dollar's movements against major foreign currencies. Some traders contended that internal market forces favored the dollar and accounted for the bulk of the buying.

Gold prices declined in worldwide trading. On the Commodity Exchange in New York, gold for current delivery settled at $387.30 a troy ounce, down $1.50 from Thursday's close. Republic National Bank quoted gold at $387.30 an ounce, $1.20 lower than the prior day's 4 p.m. EDT bid.

The talk of the session was the report released early in the day showing the nation's gross domestic product grew at an unexpectedly high rate of 3.4 percent in the third quarter.

Crops continue to fall, hit four week low

CHICAGO (AP) — Wheat futures prices sank to a four-week low Friday on the Chicago Board of Trade, reflecting slack export demand.

Corn and soybean futures also weakened as harvesting of record-large crops continued.

December wheat deliveries traded briefly below the psychologically important level $3.90 a bushel for the first time since Sept. 29 after a weekly Agriculture Department report showed U.S. wheat exports running at about the same level as last year despite USDA projections for an increase.

"We're going to have to see some big business soon from China or Russia or these export projections are going to have to be pared down," said Joel Karlin, research analyst with Kemper Securities Inc. in Chicago.

He said a close below $3.90 would likely prompt heavy speculative selling that could quickly push the price to $3.75. Wheat for December delivery fell 2 3/4 cents to $3.91 1/2 a bushel; December corn fell 1 1/4 cents to $2.16 3/4 a bushel; December oats fell3/4 cent to $1.28 a bushel; November soybeans fell 5 3/4 cents to $5.46 3/4 a bushel.

no record of them. Without records, the authorities who want to prevent homophobic violence have no idea that it is even happening.

Students who step forward and file reports alert the University to a problem, a problem that is widespread in this country and in this state.

Incidence state-wide and on-campus

According to the Governor's Task Force on Hate Crimes, in 1993, 11.5% of all hate crimes were motivated by sexual orientation.

The Fenway Community Health Center in Boston reports that homophobic crimes are on the rise in 1994. During the first six months of this year, there were 39 reports of physical assault, 70 reports of harassment, and four cases of vandalism.

There have been relatively few such reports at UMass this semester, and there are no cases pending within the University judicial system. Homophobic phone calls, threatening notes, verbal abuse, and vandalism have all been called in. But, according to Special Assistant to the Dean Susan J. Doyle, none of them have resulted in judicial action.

Often the motivation behind attacks is unclear, and the campus judicial system simply does not have enough evidence to proceed with a case, Doyle said. In other instances, reports lack enough specific details to pinpoint an attacker.

Despite this, University agencies urge all students who experience homophobic harassment or violence to come forward and report it.

UMass Ombuds Office

One of the agencies offering services and referrals is the Ombuds Office. Located in the Campus Center, Ombuds works to ensure that all UMass students and employees receive "fair and equitable treatment" within the University system.

Individuals who report to Ombuds can receive assistance in a number of ways. First, the office will work to outline options and decide on a course of action. Next, staff will supply referrals and information so students know which agencies and individuals will best serve their needs. Ombuds may also get involved in conflict resolution and mediation.

All records, contacts and communication at Ombuds are confidential, and names will not be attached to case investigation without student consent.

Ombuds is located at 823 Campus Center and has regular business hours from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. To reach the office by telephone, call 545-0867.

UMass Dean of Students Office

Ombuds frequently refers students to the Dean of Students Office, another University agency that deals with reports of homophobic harassment, violence, and discrimination.

The Dean of Students Office receives many different reports from students, but the procedure for reporting is the same for all of them: 1) Come to the office and report the incident. 2) Fill out a written, signed document that describes the incident in detail. 3) Discuss the situation with someone at the office.

Once enough information has been collected to make a case, the Office will proceed with an investigation. Eventually the case may enter the UMass judicial system. If conviction occurs, penalties for attacks depend on the severity of the crime and the prior record of the perperator.

Even if the case does not make it to the investigation stage, the Office will keep a record in its files. Knowing only some information about an attacker may help. If a number of similar cases occur, officials may be able to piece them together and make a case. The individual responsible may then be prosecuted.

The Dean of Students Office is located at 227 Whitmore. Office hours are 9 AM to 5 PM, Monday through Friday. The telephone number is 545-2684.

Other resources on-campus

Several other agencies offer assistance to students. These include the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns (Crampton House, Southwest, 545-4824), UMass Public Safety (Dickinson Hall, 545-2121), Office of Human Relations (204 Middlesex House, 545-0851), Affirmative Action (305 Whitmore, 545-3454) and Everywoman's Center (2nd Floor, Wilder Hall, 545-0883).

Study claims donations alter policy–making

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Campaign donations to some law makers by the tobacco industry influence smoking policy-making, according to a study co–authored by a University of Massachusetts assistant professor.

Michael E. Begay, assistant professor of health policy and management in the School of Public Health and Health Sciences, is co–author of a study which found that campaign donations to California legislators from the tobacco industry influenced state tobacco policy–making, in spite of support for tobacco control.

The study, also co–authored by Stanton A. Glantz, professor of medicine and a researcher at the Institute for Health Policy Studies at University of California in San Francisco, was published in the Oct. 19 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

"The central finding of our research is that the tobacco industry is having a statistically detectable effect on behavior of members of the California legislature on tobacco policy making," according to the published study.

Begay said that although the study probed only the tobacco industries relationship to the California legislation, it has significance in other states, including Massachusetts.

"Legislature only understand two things, money and pain," said Begay, "We can't beat [the tobacco industry] with money, but we can make them feel pain."

For example, in 1992, Massachusetts voters passed Question 1, which increased the state tax on cigarettes by 25 cents. The new tax money was originally intended for new tobacco education and prevention programs which Begay said did not happen.

"The $19 million was put into health care and other non- tobacco related programs," he said. "The legislature acted contrary to constituent attiudes supporting tobacco control."

Similarly, in 1988, Begay said California voters passed Proposition 99, which increased the state tobacco tax and earmarked 20 percent of the new capital for tobacco education programs.

With the passage of Proposition 99, the tobacco industry has increased its campaign contributions to members of the California legislature, according to Begay.

"Since the passage of Proposition 99 the legislature has consistently not met the constitutional requirement of Proposition 99," Begay said, "That 20 percent of the new revenues go to tobacco education programs."

Begay said in 1988 the tobacco industry failed in its $21 million effort to put down California's Proposition 99, and in 1992, it failed in it's $7 million dollar effort to defeat Question 1.

"Massachusetts is like California," said Begay, "Industry and legislation are very close. It can't be ignored, the public health activists have to fight it."

Begay said in recent years, tobacco education campaigns have been disappearing. He said the tobacco industry was a "greedy industry" which looks beyond the consumers to its profits.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Several stores refuse Simpson costumes

By Laura Schmidt
Collegian Correspondent

An O.J. Simpson Halloween costume?

Apparently, it is on the market this year, just in time for Halloween, and is a hot seller nationwide. Locally, however, it is not as popular as it is made out to be across the country.

"Our overall feeling of selling the costumes is that it would be in extremely poor taste," said an employee from the Halloween Warehouse at the Hampshire Mall in Hadley.

"It is just ridiculous to make money off the murder," said another employee from the Halloween Adventure Shop at the Holyoke Mall at Ingelside.

An employee from Funshop in West Springfield said he has heard of the costumes, but does not sell them.

"Now is not the proper time to sell the costume," the employee said. "Simpson shouldn't be subjected to all this attention, no matter if he is guilty or innocent."

Geri Spear, the owner of Costume Closet in West Springfield, said although she has heard of the Simpson costume, she has had no offers to sell them.

"It would be inappropriate to carry such a costume. We don't even carry Nazi uniforms, never mind O.J. Simpson costumes," said Spear.

An employee from Childs Toys and Hobbies in Hadley, said that people have been asking for the costume recently, but they do not carry it.

Surprisingly enough, Halloween Adventure in Manhattan, New York, has made no assertive attempt to carry the Simpson costume either.

"It is not necessary to exploit this case before the outcome of the trial is out," said the owner of the Manhattan shop. "To make an attempt to carry the Simpson costume would be an absolute absurdity."

While many shop owners do not sell the O.J. Simpson and Nicole Brown Simpson costumes on the basis that Simpson's involvement in the murder of his wife is in question, it should not be forgotten that he both physically, and mentally abused his wife in the past.

Simpson was arrested on domestic abuse charges in 1989, according to "Remember Nicole Simpson," an editorial in the New York Times. When the officers appeared at their home, Nicole Simpson was blackened with bruises, and O.J. Simpson responded by saying, "this is a family matter. Why do you want to make a big deal of it?"

It was later learned that instead of serving 30 days in jail and the year–long batterer's program that the prosecutor demanded when Simpson was sentenced, the judge gave him no jail time. Simpson was allowed to phone in his counseling sessions with a therapist of his choice because of his busy schedule.

As a result of the heightened awareness of the Simpson murder trial, more and more people, namely men, have begun to speak out against domestic violence.

A recent panel discussion on family violence sponsored by Women in Distress of Broward County, the oldest shelter for abused women in Florida, occurred on Oct. 18.

The panel was comprised of four current Miami Dolphin players and two former Dolphin players to talk about their own experiences with domestic violence. Fullback James Saxon spoke about his experience with his abusive father.

"My father, I love him, but as a man I don't respect that. To beat on a woman is nothing big, is nothing beautiful," said Saxon.

Former Dolphin player Stephen Braggs said he once practiced a form of mental abuse on his ex-wife, to whom he was married to for 10 years.

"I would say things like 'why are you always fat? Why are you always doing things wrong.'" Braggs said.

Although panels such as these are making news nationally, they are also close to home. A new organization called Mentor and Violence Prevention, (M.V.P.) has been formed right here at the University of Massachusetts.

M.V.P. is a federally funded organization which raises awareness among men concerning domestic abuse incidents. The first training sessions were held on Monday, Oct. 24 and Tuesday, Oct. 25.

Other campus reactions to the issue of domestic violence in relation to the O.J. Simpson and Nicole Simpson Halloween costumes concede that the Fund raisers help to keep Newman Center above water

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST—The Greek community at the University of Massachusetts came together to help the Newman Center keep its head above the financial waters.

The eighth annual phone–a–thon is the Newman Center's biggest fund raising event of the year. The Rev. Francis Lavelle said they need about $400,000 yearly, and the phone–a–thon raised $132,115 in pledge money.

Judy Smith, director of development at the Newman Center said they usually receive 98 percent of the pledge money, sometimes more.

"For 15 hectic nights, we attempt to call every Catholic alumnus and Catholic student's parents," Smith said.

The Newman Center, located on the UMass campus, is not funded by the University and uses fund raisers as its source of income to pay the bills and expenses of the center.

According to Smith, even though the University uses the facilities at the center occasionally, they are a religious organization, which is why UMass does not give the center any funding.

Smith said that she thinks the center should be supported by UMass, but it is not possible. Lavelle said he would rather not be funded by the University or the state.

"If you end up taking money from the state, then you also have to take their regulations," Lavelle said.

Several services are provided, including religious services and counseling as well as a library and study areas. There is also a cafeteria in the basement.

Making the fund raiser possible

Lavelle said the Greek community made the entire event possible.

"People overlook the fact that the Greeks do a lot of work," said Lavelle.

Ken Gordan, the Greek area coordinator for the phon–a– thon, from Sigma Phi Epsilon, said there was an overwhelming response from the fraternities and sororities. There were even some nights they had to turn volunteers away.

"We feel we spend a lot of time here," said Gordan. "In respect, we kind of owe it to the Newman Center."

Lavelle said because of the center's location, it acts as a "mini–campus center" for the Greek area.

"It's remarkable, especially in the winter, the social hall is packed," said Lavelle. "The Greek area uses it like a second home."

Craig Monaco, assistant social and activities chairman at Theta Chi, said he also felt that the center does a lot for them, so they wanted to give something in return.

"We sold dollar raffle tickets for a $50 prize," said Monaco. "Twenty percent went to the Newman Center, so that gave them an additional $117."

According to Monaco, that money went to the phone–a– thon total.

The Greeks helped the center, regardless of what religious beliefs they followed, said Lavelle.

"This is the Catholic center on campus," said Lavelle. "But it's open to everybody. One of the large groups of students here is Jewish. It's just a remarkable thing."

The Newman Center gave prizes to the fraternity or sorority that raised the most pledge money. As well as the winning team and individual person who totalled the most pledge money.

Sigma Phi Epsilon took first place with $9,752 raised. The Newman Center Student Association won the team prize with $4,195 raised. The Newman Center would not release the name of the winning individual.

SUMMA program supports youth

By Pat Queen and Michelle Lugo
Collegian Staff

Eighth–grade African American students from the Springfield school system are invited biannually to the University of Massachusetts to expose and interest them in college early in their academic development.

The "Springfield/University of Massachusetts Minority Achievement" program started in May of this year. Deborah Pace from the African American Outreach Program is the director of SUMMA.

SUMMA targets middle school students who are inclined to drop out because of unfavorable circumstances, particularly those children who are economically disadvantaged, come from single parent households, or for whom English is a second language.

"The SUMMA program provides skills assessment, educational and skills instruction, counseling, and cultural enrichment to support and encourage participating students throughout their high school years," said Pace.

The program is particularly involved in tutoring the students after school in the subjects of math, English and science with periodic field trips to UMass. Another goal is to motivate these students to complete high school and guarantees them admission to UMass upon their graduation from high school.

The SUMMA program will keep track of the students throughout the year and check the progress of these students. Pace said that already some of those students have been improving on their grades.

Visits to UMass campus are used to encourage and familiarize the students with the college campus and community. The University will provide the students with a series of speakers from the University staff. This year one of the speakers was David Glover who gave them an entertaining speech on the subject of UMass basketball. Professor Nicholas McBride of the journalism department also engaged the students in a heart–to–heart personal talk.

Students are then led around campus and taken to a few classes to get a feel of the atmosphere of college life, or they are taken on tours of the campus and its facilities by Collegiate Committee for the Education of Blacks and other Minority Students (CCEMBS), and ALANA Honor Society students.

Eight middle schools from Springfield, the second largest school system in the Northeast, are included in the program. Funding for the program comes from the Balfourd Foundation, the Nellie Mae Foundation and the Massachusetts Educational Opportunity Program (MEOP) of the Ronald McNair Reserve. SUMMA is free to students from Springfield.

Bob Wolff of the Afro–American Department, and Dr. Benjamin Rudriguez of the Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), proposed and implemented the program in the Springfield school system. The SUMMA program is only for African American students, other University departments are in charge of the Latino and Asian outreach programs.

Next visit for the Springfield students will be in April.

"Some of the students were so excited they didn't even want to go home," Pace said.

Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

The other day I met with some friends from high school for dinner. They were bragging about this and that. Going on and on and on. "Oh, yes, Buffy and I are keeping quite busy with our Machiavellian Concepts Book Club, so much so that we have little time to devote to directing the Ivy League Barbershop Quartet which we currently created on a complete and utter whim." I sat with a complacent smile, forking down my sesame tofu surprise. Without bragging, I knew in my heart I was light years ahead of these snobs. I write for

Missing comfort in being sane

Jimmy was insane.

He found this out one day when he was sitting outside on a bench in the middle of campus, watching the crowds go by. He began to feel strange. He felt for a moment that he was not him. Then Jimmy was above himself, looking down upon the grass and his own seated form below.

This is not normal, he thought.

So Jimmy began to try hard to be sane.

He went to big parties, and dressed in jeans and T-shirts, and drank beer, and tried to make new friends who were not crazy. "Hello," he would say. "How are you today?" But all people would do is ignore him. He would stand in a corner and watch and smile at people. Occasionally a girl would stop and nod at him, and when he went to shake her hand she would say she had to go.

Jimmy would start to think he was in a movie. That he was directing as people laughed and talked and yelled, cutting to a shot of a couple making out on the couch, and back to the main character who was a dashing and confident guy named something like Damien Sterling who scored with the chicks. He would film for a while, and then he would leave. He always felt like everything was closing in on him.

It did not make him any better.

Jimmy began to worry. The more he thought about being crazy the more he felt that's what he was becoming. He thought he saw signs of fate everywhere. He would be thinking of a song and it would begin playing somewhere. He would dream of going somewhere and he would see it in the newspaper the next day. Strangers would be talking about his thoughts. He thought the world around him was trying to speak to him.

"Don't you think he's hot?" she asked Jimmy, as she leaned over and pointed toward Mike Ditka.

Nathan Crick

Small things would bother him. He would go home and sit in his room, depressed and angry and lonely and frustrated. Then he would get worried that he was feeling this way. He did not think that people were supposed to be like that. They were supposed to be level headed and calm.

He wanted to be happy. He wanted to be normal.

But he couldn't.

Jimmy was feeling bad. It was Halloween. He went to a party dressed as Death.

"Hello, I am Death," he would say to people blandly, and then poke them in the shoulder. "You're It." A few people laughed. Most ignored him. A big guy dressed as Mike Ditka hit him on the back. "Whoa! Look out man! It's Death!" he shouted, laughing.

"You're It," Jimmy responded, poking him.

He started talking to a girl wearing bellbottoms. She laughed a lot. They talked about their costumes. They talked about how drunk they were. Jimmy thought it was going very well.

"Don't you think he's hot?" she asked Jimmy, as she leaned over and pointed toward Mike Ditka.

Jimmy looked at Mike. He had one hand resting on a wall right above the smiling figure of Princess Leia. Jimmy shook his head. "No," he said. "I do not."

Bellbottoms looked hurt, and excused herself. Jimmy sighed. Things began to squeeze in on him again, pressing in on his ears. Too many reflections of the same mirror. He walked outside. There were two guys playing guitar. Many people were listening.

"Yo, you know any VH?" asked one. "Van Halen?"

The players said no. VH rolled his eyes. "How 'bout "Free Bird"?"

The players said no. "Pearl Jam!!!" someone shouted.

Jimmy had an urge to hear Tracy Chapman. He hadn't heard "Fast Car" in a long time. He remembered listening to that song driving back from a high school dance once, when he had walked out during the last song, "Stairway to Heaven." She had been dancing with someone like Mike Ditka. There had been no reason for him to stay.

One of the guitar players began fiddling with the strings, strumming a few chords, humming to himself while his friend talked to the crows. "And I, have a feeling that I belong, and I, have a feeling I could be someone, be someone..."

His friend began to play "Brown Eyed Girl," and so the other guy joined in, with the chorus of loud voices accompanying. "Hey where did we go, days when the rain came..."

Jimmy walked away from the house, his cape flowing out behind him. The rain was pelting the windshield, slow music on the radio, tears welling in his eyes, the glaring refractions of streetlights making him squint. He sat down under a tree, the shouts of the dead echoing far away.

Jimmy smiled, contentedly, and kept on driving.

Living safely in silence and fear

Wendy Darling

I am bisexual, and as I sit here and write this article, I feel perfectly safe.

Unlike most lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender students who live on campus at UMass, I live in a safe, secure environment — perhaps the safest one on campus.

Most of the people on my floor are queer, and the ones who aren't are very accepting of my sexuality. I can be completely out to all of them, and I feel free to be myself and to express myself as a human being.

People don't stare at me when I walk down the hall. No one whispers secrets about me behind my back. No one cracks homophobic jokes. My dorm is safe.

Unfortunately, the hall I live in isn't just any hall — it's the 2 in 20 Floor for GLBTs and Their Heterosexual Allies. The original idea for the floor came from queer students who felt they had no safe space to live on campus.

It's true that there are some queer students who are out and have no trouble in their dorms, but it's also true that there are students living all over campus living in the closet because coming out would put them in personal danger.

How would their roommates react? What would their floormates think? Would people be afraid to use the same showers as they do? Will they get attacked? Where can they go if things get ugly?

There are people on this campus who ask themselves these questions every day. Their roommates talk about girlfriends or boyfriends. Should they talk about theirs? Is the girl you went to the prom with really your girlfriend — even if you weren't attracted to her?

Students have to come up with ways to seem heterosexual. Bisexuals may talk about their opposite-sex relationships. Lesbians may make references to boys they went out with in high school. Some queers just don't talk about relationships, whether they've had them or not. The path of least resistance is often the most popular.

There are other ways to act straight, off course. Laugh at the homophobic jokes. Don't talk about graffiti in the bathroom. Don't talk about the dances you've gone to, the meetings you run off to a couple times a week. Don't talk about the magazines you keep under the bed. Don't live.

Yes, there are some students living on campus that have it so bad that they consider suicide. Faced with the homophobia of their peers, they don't know what else to do.

A lot of these people are afraid to come to meetings for campus groups like the LBGA, the LBWU and Bi-Rap Group. Joining these groups would just create more ties that they'd have to cover up.

Just like going to dances or concerts. Too many lies. Too much pressure. Too much homophobia.

I don't know the solution to this problem, but no one should have to live like this. RAs should be more sensitive. All students should know where this University stands, that the situation in the dorms is not acceptable.

Every queer student on this campus should know where to go if they have problems. They should be told about the Dean of Students Office and Ombuds and all the other agencies that are looking out for them and all the groups that are available to support them.

Everybody deserves to live in safety, even if it's just in their dorm.

Major in danger of being cut

To the editor:

Please help us graduate. We, the students of Social Thought and Political Economy (STPEC) were recently informed by the Dean of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences that 50 percent of students in STPEC will be unable to take the courses we need to graduate. STPEC is a unique, interdisciplinary major in the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences.

Imagine if after three and a half years of fulfilling your financial and academic obligation you were told that due to budget cuts you would not be able to graduate? Our part-time department functions on $78,000 a year. This is about what a senior faculty member earns. All we want is $14,000 to be able to fund the upcoming spring semester. You can help us by signing our petition circulating around campus or by stopping by the STPEC office at E-27 Machmer.

Theft violates freedom of speech

To the editor:

I would like to inform you of a disturbing event regarding the distribution of the latest issue of The Voice. President Prasad Venugopal of the GSS and several other graduate students observed a woman removing all the issues of The Voice, several hundred, from the stacks behind the Collegian kiosk next to the University Store in the Campus Center.

When she was challenged as to what she was doing, the woman told Prasad that she was taking them to the post office because they had run out of copies. She also refused to identify herself when asked. Prasad offered to help her, and walking towards the Student Union, he asked her whether she was employed to help distribute The Voice. She said that she wasn't and the handed the two feet high stack of newspapers over to him. He returned them to their former location next to the University Store.

It seems likely that the woman's intention was to dispose of as many copies of The Voice as she could to prevent them from being read by the public. This is clearly a serious violation of all standards of conduct and propriety in a university setting. It undermines the basic common expectations of civility on which university life depends. Also it interferes with the freedom of the speech of the contributors to The Voice, and the freedom of students to read it.

Question attacks student groups

To the editor:

Chances are that you've seen the "No On 3" signs around campus or possibly some of the lawn signs outside of UMass. Well, I would like to inform you what No On 3 actually means.

Last year big business and special interest in this state pushed a law through the legislature that cuts off our voice. This was done in return for all the environmental work student groups have done that has interfered with their industries. This law says that students can't form or fund groups on campus that lobby in the state legislature.

This is a direct attack on MASSPIRG, a student-run group that works for environmental protection and consumer rights. Furthermore, it is an attack on any student group that wants to voice its opinion to the legislature.

Last fall students collected 85,000 signatures to repeal this law and now are running the No On 3 campaign to fight it. This law affects every student in the state and we need your help to win this campaign. It will be voted on Nov. 8 and the way we will win is to have 1,500 volunteers out there all day, holding signs and handing out leaflets.

You could also take a bumper sticker or help out with the events we are holding leading up to election day, or simply vote No On 3. However, the best way to get involved is to be a victory volunteer on election day. Please get involved. Question 3 is everyone's problem. If we don't act now, we might not have the same opportunities later on.

University cannot watch over us

To the editor:

As an undergraduate, and as a responsible adult, I take issue with Dave Copeland's article of October 28. The problem with being just a number. The University system is not an extension of mom and dad, but an institute of higher learning, with emphasis on "higher." Students are not only expected to excel academically, but also personally, being required to take an active role in their own lives — meeting class requirements, making their own decisions, dealing with their personal affairs, etc.

That Health Services sent "Tamara" a written notice regarding her over-due payment is not enough for Mr. Copeland; he wants a phone call! Perhaps if everyone paid their bills on time, there would be more money for this more personal, friendlier service. The fact that Tamara wasn't withdrawn sooner is testimony to the already overburdened system at UHS. How fortunate for her that she received a grace-period of over two years before having to fulfill her part of the bargain.

It seems to me that we are all too ready to accept and even demand passive roles in our lives. At what point do we become responsible for our own lives, and stop expecting the University to watch over us? After graduation? That's too late, I'm afraid.

The sweet sounds of public mating calls

As I walked out of my apartment building to the bus stop the other day, I was greeted by whistles, and a couple of lovely "Hey Baby's." Using this incident as a catalyst, I have attempted to comment on the mannerisms and societal burdens created by cat callers.

I'll start off by saying that I have never quite understood what guys felt they accomplished by all of this bravado. I try not to stereotype all of the members of the opposite sex, but those select few deserve mention. This type of machismo definitely merits recognition. By all means I must acknowledge the men that beg for attention.

I will have to generalize for a moment by honestly stating that this appears to be a sex-linked trait. I don't know of any female friends that exhibit this behavior. I cannot imagine one of my friends grabbing their upper torson in hopes that a passerby might gain interest. I truly have never felt the need to get a man's attention by grabbing any part of my person or calling him some variation of a pet name. This seems to be a common behavior associated with outdoor laborers. Usually it is an assortment of men all standing around practically excreting bravado. They cheer each other on when one of them receives an extended finger. These men are enjoying their masculine bonding time though.

The method behind these obnoxious revelers' madness is what interests me. What possible gain could they imagine from howling like animals with their buddies as an innocent bystander? My initial response to this question would be, "strong vocal cords." Let's be painfully honest here folks, nine times out of 10 these men are heinous looking. All of the scratching and snorting that goes on in these circles does not make for a pleasant invitation for a female.

The women that the cat callers target are of a random variety. There is absolutely nothing personal involved when you're walking down the street and you get accosted by strangers. Most women at some point have experienced the burning eyes on the back of their heads, or at least a less than subtle comment directed at some part of their anatomy. It's definitely not worth acknowledging but it's harder to ignore. You just can't get away from that one putz who wants to comment on your looks in a colorful manner. The only redeeming quality of this behavior is that the men seem less than chooosy.

The big question is, what is the remedy for this situation? As I stated before the logical thing to do would be to ignore it, but that's easier said than done. My responses are usually varied when dealing with whistles and gestures. Sometimes I can ignore it but I still hear their hands moving when I walk away. Other times I give them a gesture back, so as not to disappoint them. Other women have told me to be polite to these men, which I find ludicrous considering politeness is obviously not one of their main concerns. I would actually be interested to see a woman act encouragingly to an annoying cat caller then give a quick blow to his unsuspecting ego. I guess that's also easier said than done.

Men need to take this behavior a lot less lightly. They need to realize that it's not natural to make kissing/sucking noises or motion at someone with hand gestures. It's also pretty disgusting. I guess my main suggestion to these attention seekers is, get over yourselves. Women are not desperate enough to be entertained by a few sweaty guys commenting on their bodies. These people are obviously desperate themselves or they wouldn't be drawing attention to their lovely personality traits. This behavior is not only a nuisance but an unnecessary annoyance that could be prevented with a more active social life on the part of the males. Being a putz is not that cool.

Thug Life's debut release not disappointing

VOLUME ONE
Thug Life
Interscope/Atlantic Records

COURTESY VERNON YARD RECORDINGS

Singer/songwriter David Gray's newest album Flesh is a winner.

Ahh, the refreshing sounds of gangster rap. What would we do without all those misogynistic lyrics and rampant homophobia flooding today's music market. Thug Life, 2Pac (ooh, I'm sooo crazy) Shakur's group effort, is gangster rap at its finest. If you eliminate all the references to glocks, blunts, niggazs, hoochies and 40's the official word count of Thug Life is somewhere around seven. At the surface level that is all there is, but look a little deeper and there's more.

Thug Life is not just a gangster album, it's the gangster album. The producing and mixing is sharp and crisp, and 2Pac and his crew (an impressive group of newcomers) are in top rapping form with lyrics that slice through and mosh over catchy driving loops.

Aside from its own musical merits Thug Life's debut CD may become one of the most important in the hip-hop genre. Much in the way Guns n' Roses' Appetite For Destruction gave the L.A. glam scene a kick in the butt, Volume One reminds gangster rap posers that the rough style originally came from the streets and the level of frustration that runs through them.

Most critics of hardcore hip-hop tend to say that the rappers are fronting, with artists such as Dr. Dre saying that he only cuts albums for the sole purpose of making money. It's hard to believe that what the Thug crew raps about doesn't stem from their true experiences and feeling, whether you agree with their beliefs or not.

Finally hip-hop fans will know that there has been a growing chasm between the West Coast sound and the East Coast sound in rap today. Thug Life gaps the coast specific chasm and combines the two different sounds in a way unparalleled to any effort heard to date.

Thug Life featuring 2Pac Shakur

COURTESY MICHAEL MILLER

The bottom line is whether you hate 2Pac and his style or love it one thing remains true, he is an incredibly gifted rapper who unfortunately says so much while saying so very little it's a shame. B (Dan Friedman)

FLESH
David Gray
Hut/Virgin Records

Ragged guitars + impassioned vocals = "authenticity." So many artists have tried this formula over the years, yet few have succeeded in transcending the cliche. Welshman, David Gray is one of the few who have managed it. Post- "unplugged," one naturally approaches these acoustic affairs with a dose of skepticism, verging on the size of a well-covered rhino.

Gray clearly heard Dylan's Blood On The Tracks, and Mitchell's Ladies Of The Canyon and never quite recovered, but who can blame him. However, Mr. Tambourine Man (slight return) he isn't; Gray has a style and musical vision all his own.

His voice is by far is most valuable asset. The illegitimate love-child of a young Lennon and the Celtic soul of Van Morrison. Every song on this album exudes craftsmanship, with elemental lyrical sweeps reminiscent of The Waterboy's Mike Scott.

Gray's backing band are very tight and Neil Maccoll's guitar rings true throughout the course of the album. "Made Up My Mind," is the most upbeat track on the album, marrying slashing acoustic guitar with a R & B piano and scrawling electric guitar. This is the type of song which spills your beer and then drags you outside for a good kicking.

"Loves Old Song," is prime honky-tonk a la the Stones, with a guitar gook touched by the hand of Keith Richards.

As Gray says in the track "New Horizons," "This is no pale reflection/This is the real thing." And on this occasion you find yourself agreeing with him. B+ (Gareth Curtis)

STONER WITCH
Melvins
Atlantic Records

grunge: term used to describe a wide variety of angst- ridden music, derivative of '70's arena rock and early punk. Usually synonymous with flannel, long hair, and Seattle.

The Melvins, sometimes referred to as "godfather's of grunge" (hey wait a minute, isn't Neil Young...) since they had some sort of early relationship with a pre-pubescent Kurt Cobain, are back once again in a supposedly kinder, gentler version.

While the verdict on whether or not the Melvins are going the way of mainstream (their last album Houdini was their first for the big boys), Stoner Witch is testimony to the fact that they are slowly becoming less and less interesting. The album sits on some sort of teeter-totter that keeps shifting between freak-out, weirdo epics and bogus, Metallica-esque speed metal.

So how does this fit into the previously mentioned definition of grunge. Fact is, it doesn't. Stoner Witch sounds more like a couple of acne-ridden, Anthrax-worshipping, delinquents messing around in dad's garage with plenty of illegal substances stashed behind the amps, than those genre-shattering musicians of yesterday.

The boys in the band have already openly admitted that they are heading in a more "user friendly" direction, but unfortunately this may just be a cover-up for an obvious lack of interesting ideas.

Case in point, the track "Sweet Willy Rollbar," combines the standard growling vocals with the same old "crunchy" riffs played at warp speed that have been done a bazillion times before. This new direction may be in fact new for The Melvins themselves, but is nothing more than a stale retread.

Even when the band turns up the bizarro factor a few notches, the result sounds forced and empty. For instance the track "Shevil" which is nothing more than five-minutes of some repetitive crackling sound effect coming out of a damaged amplifier.

Stoner Witch finds The Melvins standing at the crossroads where hundreds of unsure bands have stood before. The decision to head in a more mainstream direction or head back into the ditch is always a hard one. But until the band decides advice is to keep on walking. D (Matt Audette)

Marsalis, Roberts amaze with versatility on piano

By Jonathan Ratcliff
Collegian Staff

ELLIS MARSALIS & MARCUS ROBERTS
Bowker Auditorium
Oct. 28

At the private reception after the performance, a woman was meeting Ellis Marsalis, shaking his hand and getting his autograph. She asked him, "How often do you and Marcus Roberts practice together? It seems like you have been playing with each other all of your lives."

Marsalis replied, "We have never practiced together."

The woman certainly was correct. As the two jazz pianists sat facing each other at their Steinway pianos during the last segment of their sellout jazz piano duo on Friday night, it was clear that these musicians had the ability to feel each other's playing out, as if they had indeed been playing together all of their lives. The fact that no visual cues are possible between the two musicians, (Roberts lost his vision at the age of five), only reconfirmed this remarkable interplay that relies on talent and experience.

It was clear that these musicians had the ability to feel each other's playing out, as if they had indeed been playing together all of their lives.

The performance began with a five song solo performance by the paternal jazz figure Ellis Marsalis, (you may recognize the name - he is father to three modern jazz talents, Branford, Wynton, and Delfayo).

Highlights form Marsalis's set included a spirited, improvisational-laced rendition of Duke Ellington's classic standard, "Caravan" and original compositions "When We First Met" and "Z Blues." Marsalis humbly described "Z Blues" as a "regular blues song," but the catchy riffs and striding time had toes tapping in the audience.

Marcus Roberts then came on stage for a solo performance as well, first complimenting Marsalis. "A few minutes ago, I was just like you all out there in the audience—a fan checking out some good swing. Now I've got to go to work."

And go to work he did. Roberts is only 30 years old, (half of Marsalis's age), but he is rapidly gaining respect as one of the premiere pianists in contemporary jazz. Roberts is, simply put, very fast (when he wants to be) and extremely precise; so much so that at times during the performance he appeared to be showing off. And why not? He has the skill and talent to back it up.

Roberts' four song set included a piece from his recently released album, "Gershwin for Lovers" and a Thelonius Monk composition entitled "Nice Work If You Can Get It, and You Can Get It If You Try." This compositon showed Roberts' firm grasp of timing variations and his ability to stride up and down the length of the keyboard with ease.

Roberts and Marsalis's duo for the last portion of the performance was the main course that the two solo appetizers had been preparing the audience for. When asked how the two performers feel about playing with one another, Marsalis replied, "I can't think of an analogy good enough right now, but I can tell you that it is a privilege, a learning experience for us both."

Roberts said, "I love it, it is so much fun. Ellis is a great pianist who knows so much music, a man with a true dedication to jazz."

This respect for one another was clearly evident in their playing. The two performers switched roles with each other from the lead and rhythm playing with such grace and ease that it was hard to tell at times who was playing what.

The duet included a couple of Thelonius Monk compositions. One of them, entitled "In Walked Bud," showed Marsalis' and Roberts' ability to pull off intricate timing changes without a hitch.

Although the closing John Coltrane composition started fast, it managed to accelerate even more as it progressed. The entire piano setup was shaking with the performers playing. Here, more than in any other song in the duo, Marsalis and Roberts showed that they can not only trade off, but play note for note and chord for chord as well.

The appreciative audience immediately rose to a standing ovation. Marsalis and Roberts returned shortly with wide smiles, and sat down for an amazing improvisational jazz/blues jam. There appeared, for a moment, a competition between the performers, but with the same respect and feeling of duality that the whole performance contained.

Black 47 rouses audience at Pearl Street

By Tracy Monahan
Collegian Staff

Traffic in New York City delayed Black 47's performance for more than an hour, but the wait didn't take the enthusiasm out of the show.

Black 47 brought their brand of Irish rock to Pearl Street on Friday night. Starting the show with "James Connolly," they had the crowd on their feet, fists raised in the sky.

With a combination of guitars, tin whistles and uillean pipes the band rocked through a set that lasted almost two hours.

Swigging from a beer bottle, lead singer Larry Kirwan led the audience in fist raising, clapping and Irish jigging. He introduced every song with an anecdote.

At one point the band played an instrumental jig that had the crowd jumping in time to the music.

They played some songs off their new album, "Home of the Brave," and also a few old favorites from their first full- length LP, "Fires of Freedom."

The band played "Funky Ceili (Bridie's Song)" one of their most popular songs about a woman left behind in Ireland when her Irish rocker boyfriend moved to the Bronx.

Kirwan had a twinkle in his eyes when he sang about Bridie. He said in a phone interview on Tuesday that Bridie was his old girlfriend, whose name had been changed to "protect the innocent."

The band played "40 Shades of Blue," a song about staying out all night drinking. Kirwan went silent during the line "you'd sell your soul for a cigarette," letting the crowd do the singing.

He said it was the best "cigarette" he'd ever heard and made the crowd do it again. He said it was "better than anywhere, even New York City."

The band kept the small crowd pumped up with every song. From "Maria's Wedding" to the rap by band member and ex-NYPD cop Chris Byrnes, the band went strong.

Kirwan assured the crowd that the new album would be more available in local stores, because things had been screwed up with the distribution.

After the show, which was capped by an encore of the song "Livin' in America," Kirwan said he really enjoyed playing Northampton.

"It's such a warm atmosphere," Kirwan said. "We were stuck in traffic in New York City and I usually like to come to Northampton early so we can walk around."

Kirwan was concerned with finding out how easy it was to get the new album in the Valley. The album "Home of the Brave" was released on Oct. 18.

"But on the other hand, Feldman, having the biggest brain among us means that it is mere child's play to subdue you with an ordinary headlock!"

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Tackle down to work this morning. Once onerous responsibilities are out of the way, you will feel much better! You may have to appease someone you do not really like.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Collaborative endeavors will bring greater financial security. Make sure everyone involved is prepared to sacrifice. Unusual ideas may be in greater demand than ever before.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): It pays to be prudent where your financial interests are concerned. Keep your guard up when dealing with high-pressure salespeople. Reviewing an old friendship could have many benefits.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Your stock rises when you have ample resources to back up your promises. Try not to get mixed up in other people's problems. Mediating personal disputes can waste valuable time and energy. Remain neutral.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Take advantage of clearance sales if you need office supplies or household furnishings. It feels good to get back on a normal schedule. Take care of any details that must be handled before signing an agreement.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Daydreaming is fine, as long as you do not lose sight of reality. Focus on developing a recently discovered talent. A hobby could turn into a real gold mine. Your faith in a loved one is restored.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): New clues surface in your search for truth. Fact works better than fault-finding when dealing with a sensitive soul. An attractive member of the opposite sex offers valuable advice.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Irritability will need confident answers and extra cooperation, be ready. Do more listening than talking when in the presence of experts. Do not be swayed by hasty impressions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): You and a bright associate have a stimulating talk. This person will feel inspired when you share your creative ideas. Warm words of encouragement will earn an ardent your way. Take pride in your achievements.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Your spring feels energy and fun to your personal relationships. People rally to your cause when you suggest ways to improve your environment. Show your romantic side. Make reservations for a weekend getaway.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): A romantic partner may drown your attention from work. Playfulness on the job could land you in hot water. Let a changing view know how you feel. You have a right to greater personal freedom.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): You may get an opportunity to right a wrong. Seize the moment! Family members are willing to listen to constructive suggestions. Tackle those household chores that were temporarily put aside. Timely home repairs save money.

Field Hockey defeats upstart Hawks

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

With 13:53 left in the game, freshman forward Amy Ott drove a rebound past St. Joseph's goalie Joan Fedesco to give the No. 5 University of Massachusetts field hockey team a 1–0 victory over the Hawks on Saturday.

The win made field hockey the third UMass team to clinch an Atlantic 10 championship this weekend. The Minutewomen (11–2–3, 3–0–1 in the A–10) follow the women's and men's soccer teams, who both clinched their titles on Friday.

The Hawks came into the game in the midst of their best season in recent memory, with a record of 12–5–1, including a 2–1 overtime win over a talented Virginia squad. They entered Saturday's game fired up, hoping to upset their highly rated conference rivals.

Unfortunately for the upstart Hawks, the Minutewomen still had a bad taste in their mouths after being upset 1–0 in overtime by Connecticut, and were waiting for a chance to avenge it.

The normally slow–starting Minutewomen came out of the gate flying in the first half, peppering Fedesco with 12 shots and nine penalty corners. But the sophomore goalie came up big for the visitors, keeping the Minutewomen off the scoreboard and the Hawks in the game.

Despite the lack of scoring, Donnelly was encouraged by her team's perofmance in the first half.

"That was some of the best hockey we've played all year," Donnelly said. "I was really happy with the way we were playing."

The Hawks seemed to gain confidence the longer the score remained knotted. They continually rushed into the danger of Natalie Hart's shot in an attempt to force bad shots and passes. But even when they did get offensive opportunities the Minutewomen defense came through and made the plays.

Hilary Rose ventured out of the net several times to kick the ball out of the circle. The defense in front of Rose played one of its best games of the season, allowing only five shots in the game and no penalty corners.

"[No penalty corners] is a sign of good defense," Rose said. "We were very disciplined. Everybody stuck to their jobs very well."

After a number of missed opportunities in front of the net, the Minutewomen finally got on the board. Taking advantage of the chaos in front of Fedesco, Ott collected the rebound of a Kyle Rothenberger shot and drove home the game winner. The goal was Ott's third of the season.

"There was a lot of pressure for us to score, because we didn't want to go into another overtime," Ott said.

"Amy's been playing great," Donnelly said. "Her confidence is building. She didn't look like a freshman today."

The Hawks had a great chance to tie the score late in the game. St. Joe's went to a desperation offense, and it paid off as they forced a penalty stroke.

Hawk freshman Melanie Taub fired the ball low to the right of Rose, but the Massachusetts goalie dove in time to deny the Hawk scoring chance.

"It was a great save," St. Joseph's Coach Michelle Finegan said. "Hilary Rose is a great goalie."

The stroke was the second Rose had faced this season. With the score tied at zero in a matchup with No. 1 North Carolina, Rose faced a stroke from US National team member Cindy Werley. Rose stopped the shot forcing the game into overtime which UMass eventually won 1–0.

Both Rose and her teammates have confidence in her ability to handle the pressure and stop the stroke.

"When the stroke was taken, I was just thinking 'This is not going to go into overtime. It's just not going to happen,'" said Rose, who balked at the idea of it being a pressure situation. "What pressure? There's no pressure on me. Everyone expects the person to score."

"We act like [the stroke] is not even being taken, because we know she'll save it," midfielder Colleen Duffy said. "We're so confident that we don't even have to watch."

St. Joseph's, which fell to 1–3–0 in the A–10 with the loss, will get another shot at the Minutewomen next Saturday. Massachusetts will go into the Atlantic 10 tournament as the top seed and will face the fourth seeded Hawks in the first round of the tournament.

UMass has won the last three Atlantic 10 tournament Chapionships and have not lost a conference match-up since 1991.

The Minutewomen return to action tomorrow afternoon for their final regular season game against Springfield College. Seniors Danielle Borges, Duffy, Hart and Kyri Sparks will be honored in their final regular season home game in a pregame ceremony.

The second half began much like the first. UMass was forced to punt and once again May's big return sparked the BU offense. Riemer (punting from his own 14) punted out to the UMass 46, only to have May return it 31 yards.

A net gain of one yard for the UMass punt coverage team. As in the first half, Dale ran the ball in for a touchdown, directly set up by a big punt return, tying the score at 21.

Conversely, it was Tony Williams (3–101) and Breon Parker (2–47) returning kickoffs that set up the Minuteman offense. Twice Williams took kickoffs after BU scores out to midfield, with the Minuteman offense unable to capitalize like the Terriers.

"We can't allow field position out to the 50, that put too much pressure on our defense," Allen said. "They just weren't able to take advantage."

After the Minutemen were down 28–21 in the third quarter, Parker took the kickoff 36 yards to the BU 48. It was the second kickoff that the kicker Morello was forced to make the tackle. The play led to an Eric Oke field goal, cutting the score to 28–24.

Despite poor coverage, Riemer had a solid day punting the ball. He averaged 36 yards while punting eight times. At one point in the third quarter, Riemer felt pressure while attempting a punt and ran for 20 yards and the first down.

"That was not a fake punt. He still could have gotten the punt off, but he looked up and saw room to run along the right sideline," Hodges said.

Different facets of special teams gave BU and UMass opportunities to win the game. The Terriers took advantage, the Minutemen did not.

placing eighth for UMass. Waeger was second for the Minutewomen at the A–10's last season, and in UMass' top five at many races, but lower leg problems have forced her to refrain from running for most of the past six months.

The bruised and battered Minutewomen have a well deserved week off before competing in the ECAC Championships Nov. 12 in Boston's Franklin Park. Despite the presence of many of the nation's top teams, LaFreniere hopes to do well on the familiar Boston course where they have already run once this season.

in both matches scoring the shutout against St. Bonaventure and giving up the one goal to Cornell. She has an impressive 0.67 goals against average for the year.

UMass now has a week off to rest after playing three games in five days. This upcoming weekend the Minutewomen will be hosting the Atlantic–10 tournament at home, where they will be the No. 1 seed. The games begin on Friday at 12 p.m. when No. 2 George Washington meets No. 3 Temple. UMass plays No. 4 Rutgers at 2 p.m. The Championship game will be on Sunday at 1 p.m. played well, collecting seven kills, six digs and a team–high .335 hitting percentage.

"They were scrappy, but we frustrated them," Kenny said. "We had too many weapons on the net, and were able to wear them down."

The Lady Knights could not muster much offense, and saw their record drop to 5–17, 1–8 in the A–10.

Sideouts: The Minutewomen have reached 20 wins for the first time since 1987, when the squad finished with a record of 21–9.

UMass returned from a six game road trip this weekend where they went 4–2. The Minutewomen are an impressive 12–1 at home.

UMass is in action again Tuesday night when they host Fairfield.

Blair Manning decides to leave UMass hockey

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hockey team suffered an unexpected blow when sophomore center Blair Manning announced he was leaving the team to play for the Seattle Thunderbirds of the Western Hockey League.

Manning, a 5–foot–10 inch, 175 pound native of Sherwood Park, Alberta, centered Blair Wagar and Rob Bonneau on UMass' top line in its return season of a year ago. He scored eight goals and recorded 23 assists for 31 points, the fifth highest mark on the team.

"We did everything in our power to keep him here but he decided to forgo his education because he would rather play Major Junior [Hockey]," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "I think he is wrong. I think it's a big mistake on his part."

In UMass' exhibition game against Seneca College and its regular season opener with UMass–Lowell, Manning was displaced by Warren Norris, and instead found himself being paired with constantly changing wingers. Naturally, his playing time decreased significantly, a reported reason for his departure. But Mallen said Manning was happy with the school, but he felt time was running out for him to have a chance at playing in the NHL.

"He and his father told me they had absolutely no problems [with anything at UMass]," Mallen said. "[Manning's] mind was made up that Major Junior hockey was his route to professional hockey. For a Canadian kid, Major Junior is a very high aspiration if he wants to play in the NHL."

Manning was credited with the assist on Tom O'Connor's goal against the Riverhawks, UMass first Hockey East goal and its lone tally in the 6–1 loss.

UMass is the youngest team in Hockey East, and it dressed no juniors or seniors in its second league contest Saturday against Providence. Junior Sal Manganaro, a transfer from Boston College, fractured his kneecap against UML, the first depletion of UMass' offensive ranks.

Manning scored his first collegiate goal in UMass' 1993 home opening 9–1 win over Villanova on October 30. He scored twice in a 5–4 overtime losing cause to Connecticut College on January 14. He also netted the game winner against Iona, a 7–2 Minuteman victory last November 12.

He took 60 shots, received 24 penalty minutes and recorded a +20 rating in 1993–94. He scored one power play goal, in a 10–3 win over Fitchburg State on November 13.

Manning is an accomplished two sport star, with an impressive track record in lacrosse. He played for the Alberta provincial team and was named an All–Canadian at the Canadian Junior Field Lacrosse Nationals.

There was a feeling of shock among the players over the sudden departure.

"He was a friend to all of the players, especially the American kids," Mallen said. "[But his departure] is not a big deal. At this point I just look at the positives. On the flip side, look at Dean Campanale, we think he and guys like Tommy Sheehan can fill the void. So it might be a blessing in disguise."

UM men's soccer takes A-10 title

Siljanovski leads way in 4–0 domination of lowly St. Bonaventure for first championship

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

There is a first time for everything, and Friday was the time for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team to clinch an unprecedented Atlantic 10 Championship.

The Minutemen (11–5–1, 6–1 A–10) did it by blanking the league's sacrificial lamb, St. Bonaventure, 4–0 at Garber Field. Goalkeepers Mark Wolf and Eric Gruber combined to hold their opponent scoreless for the eighth time this season.

Bonnies	0

"After we beat Rutgers, I knew we had a chance to win [the regular season title]," UMass Coach Sam Koch said.

It was fair to assume that UMass would create the bulk of scoring opportunities in this match and it did, outshooting the Bonnies 13–5 by halftime. The Bonnies' offense has been terribly anemic all year, with just 12 goals in 18 games, one of which was a forfeit by Niagara that gave St. Bonaventure only its second win against 16 losses.

Midfielder co–captain Mike Doyle, one of six seniors honored during pre–game ceremonies on "Senior Day," nearly made it one to remember in the 18th minute when he looked at an open net, vacated by freshman goalie Adrian Kane. However, Doyle was quite close to the end line and could not direct his shot on net.

Dave Siljanovski checked in for Hossein Giahi in the 25th minute and soon went to work. At 27:48, leading scorer Karsten Bremke bent a sweet shot into the net's far right corner off of a Siljanovski rebound. It was Bremke's eighth goal this season and Siljanovski's team–best fifth assist.

St. Bonaventure's chances were so few and far between, one worried Wolf might fall asleep. If not for the fine play of freshman midfielder Jerry Russo, the Bonnies' could have gone the entire opening 45 minutes without a shot.

SBU was not helped by corner kicks either, as it took just three to UMass' 11. But it began mounting bids as the horn neared. The best being a Matt Phillips' blast in the 43rd minute from just inside the area that Wolf had to save while diving to his right.

Dan Chagnon has never scored a goal in the maroon and white, and it appeared he was getting jealous of Bremke and Doyle, two primarily defensive players who continue to score regularly. Chagnon had two great headers as the second half began, the first off a corner kick by Joel Pittman in the 49th minute and then in the 51st off a throw–in by Benny Shoelly. Both shots sailed just over the net.

Doyle, with only one goal to his credit in his first three seasons, scored his sixth of 1994 at 57:40, when he buried a rebound of a Chagnon shot following a Joe Jacobson indirect kick.

"It's nice to get one in my last game [at Garber Field]," Doyle said.

UMass did not ease the pressure on Kane, as its shot total would eventually reach 22. Siljanovski headed another Shoelly throw–in that grazed the crossbar in the 67th, and Kane had to come rushing from his goalmouth to stop a Siljanovski breakaway in the 71st.

Wolf got his first real scare in the 69th minute, when he bobbled a long range drive by Chip Warner and then just got his hands on a put–back attempt by David Hesch.

At 78:20, Siljanovski deposited a Brad Miller feed with authority to make it 3–0.

Between the 82nd and 83rd minutes, two UMass reserves came ever so close to opening their goal accounts as well. First, Tashi Tshering lifted a shot over the net with no one around, then Lee Marlow did the same.

But at 86:04, Miller added insult to injury with a firm strike from the edge of the area. None other than Siljanovski earned the assist.

"I'm just happy we pulled it off," Koch said. "It wasn't really until the second half that we finished it up."

Corner kicks: UMass concluded its season yesterday at Philadelphia Textile where Koch picked up his 100th career victory in the 4–2 win. This weekend the team heads to Rutgers to begin play in the Atlantic 10 Tournament as the top seed. The Collegian reported previously that the winner of the tournament gains an automatic NCAA berth, but that is not the case. The A–10 post–season champion plays the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference champion for that berth.

Langevin emerges victor at A–10 Championship

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Halloween might be today, but Saturday provided the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team with more than enough frights and spooks to last well into next season, let alone tonight.

After a bizarre race, UMass limped back to Amherst, literally, having placed a disappointing third at the Atlantic 10 Championship.

The day was not an entire loss though as Melissa Langevin became the first UMass runner ever to win the A–10's individual champion honor. Langevin shattered host West Virginia's course record by an astounding 44 seconds, finishing in 18:06, 34 seconds ahead of her nearest competitor.

"Langevin's got a great shot at (qualifying for the) Nationals," UMass Coach Julie LaFreniere said. "I'm ecstatic about her performance."

"I was really excited, but then again anyone would," Langevin said. "I went out there with the intention of winning and I did, which felt good."

Unfortunately, the team did not manage the hill laden Morgantown W.V. course quite as well, placing third overall with 60 points.

The Mountaineers captured the A–10 title with 35 points, as many of their runners set personal record times on their home turf. Meanwhile, St. Joseph's narrowly edged the Minutewomen with 58 points.

"It was disappointing," Langevin said. "We were all kind of bummed."

Ideal running conditions (sunny, cool and dry) greeted the competitors, but at the one mile point the morning turned very ugly, very quickly for the Minutewomen.

Kristin Donaldson was spiked as she descended a hill around the one mile point and fell, starting a chain reaction that claimed three other runners as well. Moments later, at almost the same spot, Kirsten Brindgardner slipped on the hill, still wet with the morning's dew, and slid down it on her back. Neither runner was able to fully recover from their respective incidents and finished up with disappointing times.

"The course ate Sherryl Lyons up," LaFreniere said. Lyons aggravated a foot injury suffered earlier this season and is questionable for next weekends ECAC Championships, easily the biggest race of the entire season.

No problem was worse than the mysterious illness that fell upon freshman Rebecca Donaghue. Complaining the night before of a sore throat, watery eyes and being "achy all over," Donaghue finished behind her usual pace. Despite the ailments, she was still able to finish eighth. In 18:50, and secure a spot along with Langevin on the All–Atlantic 10 team.

"She ran a gutsy race," LaFreniere said. "She just kept going even though she looked like she was going to pass out after the first mile and a half. She's so competitive, running with those kids (the top finishers) despite everything. She was running with that group out of sheer guts. She was unbelievable."

West Virginia's course starts on the side of a hill and features precious little flat areas. Runners like Donaghue, more known for their speed than endurance struggled on the hills, while they were beneficial to Julie Moreau and Molly Dunlap.

"Speed takes a back seat to strength and endurance on this type of course," LaFreniere said.

Moreau placed fourteenth overall, in 19:26, despite a dreadful start. Moreau was dead last after 150 meters, but kept passing runners as the hills wore her competition down. Dunlap finished sixteenth in a time of 19:35 after a strong race.

Jen Waeger also provided some relief for the Minutewomen as she continued her comeback,

Women's soccer sweeps weekend

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team increased its chances of receiving a wild card berth to the NCAA tournament with two wins over the weekend.

On Friday, the Minutewomen beat St. Bonaventure 1–0 to capture their second Atlantic 10 title in a row.

Bonaventure	0

But it was yesterday's game at Cornell, won 2–1, that significantly improved UMass' chances of going to the NCAAs.

"It was a good regional win for us," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "But it won't put us in the top four [in the region]."

The top four teams in the region receive automatic bids to the NCAAs. The question of who the top four will be was further clouded by Dartmouth's loss yesterday to Harvard and Connecticut's win over Hartford.

Massachusetts	2
Cornell	1

Against Cornell, UMass once again gave up the early goal, 5:05 into the match, when Tasha Fleury scored on an assist by Heldi Foster. But the Minutewomen came right back just five minutes later. UMass received a free kick after junior Nicole Roberts was grabbed in the jersey by a Cornell defender, who received only a yellow card for the blatant action. Sophomore defender Erin Lynch took the direct kick from 20 yards out and scored.

"That was a beautiful free kick, a pretty goal," Rudy said. "She did a great job in the back. She played spectacular."

UMass got its second goal in the second half at the 58:28 mark when the explosive Roberts scored unassisted. The goal was her tenth of the season and it moved her up to eighth place on the UMass career goals list with 26. She also moved into ninth place on the all–time career points list with 68. Roberts is now tied with sophomore sensation Rebecca Myers for the team lead in total points with 23. Current UMass Assistant Coach April Kater holds both the career goals (35) and career points (92) records.

In the second half, the Minutewomen received a scare when sophomore midfielder Julie Magid got smacked in the nose and had to leave the game. Magid will be examined today to determine the extent of her injury. With the injury to Magid, senior forward Melissa Mitchell was moved to midfield and according to Rudy, played outstanding.

"She played her heart out and played very well. She did a phenomenal, fantastic job."

Erica Iverson and Nikki Abrenholz also drew praise from Rudy for their play as did LeDuc and Roberts.

"[Rachel] LeDuc and [Nicole] Roberts were like bees up front. They were buzzing all over the defenders," Rudy said. "The back four did a great job. They were very good in minimizing the chances [Cornell] had."

Against the Bonnies, the Minutewomen dominated but only came up with only the one goal. Sophomore Amy Powell scored the first goal of her career at the 6:34 mark of the first half. Myers crossed the ball to LeDuc, who in turn crossed the ball further to the right side of the box to an open Powell. The midfielder then drilled the shot from about 12 yards out for the score.

"I feel good," Powell said. "It's about time. I've been frustrated with my offense and I finally got one in."

UMass had several other chances to score but could not connect. One such chance was when Myers apparently scored on a header but offsides was called on the play.

Mitchell once again drew praise from Rudy.

"She had a good game. She did a nice job," he said.

Minutewomen reach 20 victories with wins over Rutgers and Temple

By Brian Perillo

The Owls never knew what hit them.

The Massachusetts volleyball team was able to keep Temple off balance all night Saturday en route to a 15–8, 15–3, 15–7 victory at the Curry Hicks Cage.

UMass collected its 20th win of the season, against only three defeats, and raised its all–important Atlantic 10 mark to 7–3. That record places them all alone in third place, now a game ahead of the Owls, who stand at 6–4 in the A–10 (19– 10 overall) after the loss.

"It was critical for us to win this match," UMass Coach Bonnie Kenny said, whose team had not defeated Temple during her two year tenure.

Three weeks ago, the Minutewomen traveled to Philadelphia and were handed their second loss of the season, and their second in a row, by the Owls. That disappointing 11–15, 3–15, 12–15 drubbing left a bad taste in the mouths of the Minutewomen, and gave Temple a huge edge in their battle for third place in the conference.

Saturday, however, UMass looked to be on a mission, as they jumped out to a quick 6–1 lead in game one. Temple closed the gap to 8–7, but a thunderous kill by sophomore outside hitter Dionne Nash returned the momentum to the Minutewomen. They would never look back, cruising to the 15–8 victory.

Temple had come into the match a bit fatigued, after suffering a tough five game loss in Rhode Island the night before.

"We were on and they were off," Nash said. "We were able to take advantage of it."

During game two, the Minutewomen kept Temple on their heels and again took the early lead, 8–1, before rolling to the win, 15–3. Temple looked out of synch all game, just the opposite of the Minutewomen, who could do no wrong.

The Minutewomen used a variety of different offensive weapons. Five UMass players had seven or more kills, led by sophomore Giza Rivera's 14, the 17th time the outside hitter has led the team in kills this season.

The key to UMass' success, however, was the play of their middle blockers, namely freshmen Michelle Paciorek and Leigh Readey.

"We need an equal distribution between our outside hitters and our middle," Kenny said. "That's the key to an offense. They weren't prepared for us to run the middle."

Readey had an impressive .318 hitting percentage to go with nine kills, while Paciorek was a big factor on defense, and tallied seven kills herself. The two middle blockers totalled 39 attacks, as compared to 21 in the first match against Temple in Philadelphia.

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Middle blocker Michelle Paciorek and outside hitter Giza Rivera successfully block an attempted kill in volleyball action at the Curry Hicks Cage Saturday night. UMass defeated Temple in three games.

"Coach wants us to work the middle more because it frees up the outside," Paciorek said. "That way they can't double team our outside hitters."

The Minutewomen also played one of their best games on defense.

"We played well at the net, and contained their offense," Kenny said. "We set up a good block and we touched a lot of balls."

"Last time their hitters had a field day," Nash said. "It's nice to have a good feeling that you can rely [on your blockers]."

Freshman Lesley Nolan led UMass with 14 digs, as well as collecting eight kills, and it was the Massachusetts defense that brought the almost 500 fans at the Cage to their feet with spectacular diving saves all night, including several from Rivera, sophomore Kim Mizner, and junior Beth Cabral.

"We played well all–around as a team," Paciorek said.

In game three, UMass kept the pressure on the Owls as they ran off five straight points to pull away to an 11–3 lead. Temple put a little run together but it was too little, too late, for the Owls. An ace by Mizner ended the game, 15–7, and gave the Minutewomen the match, three games to none.

"The way we beat them was key," Kenny said. "The points [in the case of a tie–breaker] are in our favor. We were mentally prepared for this game."

"We had a good upbeat tempo all game," Nash said, who was second on the team with 12 kills and tied with Nolan for a team best hitting percentage of .333. "[Setter] Cass [Anderson] distributed the ball real well. This was one of the best games we played all year, along with [the contests against] UConn and George Washington."

Friday night, the Minutewomen took on a determined Rutgers team, and were able to defeat the Lady Knights, 15–6, 15–11, 15–7. Rivera led the way for UMass with 14 kills, while Paciorek tallied 10 kills, and was in on three of the Minutewomen's six blocks. Nash also

Football loses a tough one to Boston University

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

While last year's Massachusetts–Boston University game differed from this past weekend's contest, one thing was the same — the result.

The Minutemen lost to the No. 8 Terriers for the second consecutive year, falling 28–24 Saturday afternoon at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium in front of a Parent's Day crowd of 15,184 [the most since the Holy Cross game in 1987].

Last year's Massachusetts–BU tilt was what Minuteman Coach Mike Hodges referred to as "an embarrassing loss," as the Terriers rolled 28–9 at Nickerson Field on the BU campus. Saturday's game did not cause embarrassment on the Massachusetts [4–4 overall, 3–3 in Yankee Conference] side, as the team was in the game from start to finish.

Boston U.	28
Massachusetts	24

Although early on, BU [7–1, 5–1] wasted no time to reach the endzone. On its second drive of the first quarter, freshman fullback Julien Dale [24 carries, 80 yards] carried the ball three times, and scored on the third from three yards out. Senior Mike Morella booted the extra point, making it 7–0 in favor of BU.

A couple of drives later, the Terriers were in field goal position, only to have Morella's try blocked by sophomore Legista Beckford. With 47 seconds left on the clock, the Minutemen utilized the limited time in fine fashion, as junior fullback Rene Ingoglia [18 carries, 183 yards] culminated a three play drive with a spectacular 69–yard touchdown run. Sophomore Eric Oke nailed the PAT to even up the score at seven.

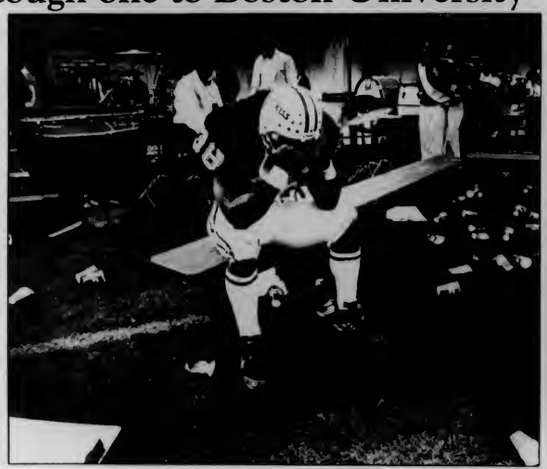
BU then answered the Massachusetts score on the very next offensive play. On the Minuteman 41, senior quarterback Robert Dougherty [14–34, 220 yards, 55 yards on the ground] threw to senior Carnell Henderson at about the 30. Henderson, with four Massachusetts players around him, managed to break loose as defensive backs Jason Mumford and Tony Williams collided, and went in for the score. With the Morella extra point, BU led 14–7.

Inside four minutes to go in the first half, Ingoglia had his fifth rush over 60 yards in the last two games at McGuirk Stadium, sprinting for 71 yards before stepping out of bounds at the three.

"I think [Rene's] is just a heck of a player," Terrier Coach Dan Allen said. "He has explosive speed. You have one breakdown against a guy like him, and it's going to cost you. And it did just that."

Ingoglia's run set up an eight–yard TD by sophomore Frank Alessio, and Oke's PAT tied it at 14–14.

Massachusetts took advantage of the last 36 seconds in the first half, marching 26 yards on three plays and scoring on a QB Andrew McNeilly [10–27, 86 yards] nine–yard scamper up the middle. Oke kicked the extra point, and the Minutemen took a seven point lead into halftime, 21–14.



COLLEGIAN FILE

UMass runningback Ron Brockington sits dejected after Saturday's 28–24 loss to visiting BU.

The third quarter was the turning point of the game. The Terriers scored on their first drive, as Dale ran up the middle for a one–yard TD. The PAT knotted things up at 21–21.

Massachusetts, after a couple of drives resulting in punts, failed to get into BU territory until less than five minutes to go in the quarter. With third down and 10 on the Minuteman 44, McNeilly threw an errant pass that was intercepted by Terrier senior DB Chris Helon.

The turnover made way for a 12–yard touchdown run by Dale, and a PAT through the uprights, giving BU a 28–21 lead.

Massachusetts could only muster a 27–yard field goal by Oke after reaching the BU nine–yard line in the fourth quarter. The Minutemen had four separate drives to score, but were unable to convert. Against Northeastern next week, Hodges knows the Minutemen must seize their chances.

"We had the opportunities and we continually found a way to take us out of those opportunities," Hodges said. "You can't do that against a good football team.

"These things happen at one time or another. We just have to go out, and find a way to get it cleaned up."

Special teams play a major role in Minutemen's loss

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

Special teams often play a major role in big football games. Saturday afternoon at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, both the University of Massachusetts and Boston University had special teams dictate the flow of the game.

"I always say that special teams is one–third of the game, and to win you must win that third," BU Coach Dan Allen said. "Today, I think we did that."

The Terriers defeated the Minutemen 28–24, in part to an impressive punt return team. UMass hung tough, somewhat due to a special teams unit that blocked a field goal and excelled at kickoff returns. Both teams combined for 345 return yards.

"In a big game like this, it often does come down to special teams," UMass Coach Mike Hodges said. "Both teams got great field position all day."

BU entered the game with the second highest punt return average in Division I–AA, over 17 yards per return. John May, stepping in for Carnell Henderson, ran back three punts for 75 yards.

"I felt like I could break it anytime, as soon as I touched the ball, I was ready to break out," May said.

Allen wanted Henderson solely to work on his receiver, and the moved paid off with May's big day, as well as Henderson's (7 catches, 126 yards and one touchdown). May kick–started the BU offense in the first quarter. Justin Riemer punted from his own 20, sending a 34 yard punt to the BU 46. May promptly found a hole up the middle, returning it 31 yards to the UMass 23.

A net of three yards for the UMass punt coverage team. Six plays later Julien Dale scored to put BU on top, 7–0.

"We were bad covering punts. We have to do a better job of covering," Hodges said.

BU was looking to pad its first quarter lead, and was set for a 26 yard field goal by Mike Morello. UMass' Legista Beckford fought through the line and blocked the attempt. Three plays later, Rene Ingoglia ripped off a 69 yard touchdown run, completing the shift in momentum.

"That blocked punt was huge, it held us in it and turned things a little," Hodges said.

Late penalty ruins improved UMass' chances of victory

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, RI— The University of Massachusetts hockey team that fell to UMass–Lowell in its season opener must have gotten lost on the way back from Tully Forum. A new bunch of freshmen and sophomores found their way to Schneider Arena Saturday, and they had noticeably improved.

The Minutemen could not even be momentarily discounted in their 5–4 setback to Providence College, a loss that hinged on a potentially ill–whistled 5–on–3 Friars' advantage that commenced when Mike Evans was caught for tripping at 16:28 of the third period. Blair Wagar received a two minute penalty for high–sticking at 15:52.

So a wounded Jaynen Rissling, Armand Latullipe, and Tiger Holland, who replaced Tony Giusto in the lineup, took the ice for what was sure to be a heart stopping 1:24. The score was tied, 4–4, and Dave Kilduff made a great save on Justin Gould as the clock approached the 3:00 mark.

There were only 19 ticks remaining on Evans' infraction when PC captain Brady Kramer shoved a backhander between Kilduff's skate and the right post. Long after time expired, assistant coach Bob Deraney was incredulous over the last–minute decisions of referees Drew Taylor and Dennis Hughes.

"I can't believe they called [the Evans' penalty] that late in the game," Deraney said.

But if any team is to be the undeserving victim of such tight officiating, it is UMass, the rookie in a league that Minuteman Coach Joe Mallen never stops recognizing for its toughness.

"We're the new kid on the block, so whatever happens with the officiating we're going to have to deal with," Mallen said.

UMass did not deal with nearly the same short–handed difficulties it endured against the River Hawks. The penalty killing unit did not skate until 10:52 of the middle stanza, though the Friars converted two of their four power plays.

UMass is still without a power play goal, but it was granted only three man advantages Saturday (opposed to 13 against UML), further reason to question the referees' failure to swallow their whistles in the final frame.

UMass' offense yielded much of the coherence it lacked in the opener. Mallen juggled each of his lines and inserted Dean Campanale, Josh Hoekstra and Tom Sheehan in place of Sal Manganaro (broken kneecap, expected to miss two months), Judd Smith, and Blair Manning, who has left the team (see related story, page 7).

The fourth line of Sheehan centering for Hoekstra and Gerry Cahill saw considerably more ice time than the previous unit of Cahill, Smith and Latullipe.

Hockey just misses upset, falls to Providence

By Anthony Guido

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The stage was set for an upset. A tired opponent, a shaky goaltender, and a non–existent crowd.

The University of Massachusetts hockey team came up just short in its upset bid, falling to Providence 5–4 Saturday night in Hockey East action at Schneider Arena in front of 1,016 fans.

Providence captain Brady Kramer scored at 18:09 of the third period to put PC on top after the Minutemen were called for consecutive penalties.

Providence	5
Massachusetts	4

"I think [the penalties] are part of the game," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "Obviously, we are the new kids on the block and we are going to have to deal with that."

The score was knotted at four late in the third period, when UMass' Blair Wagar was called for high–sticking at 15:52. The Minutemen were to be two men down, as Mike Evans then picked up a tripping penalty at 16:28.

"Anytime you lose it hurts, but this was a real tough way to lose, especially being down two men in the last three minutes," UMass goaltender Dave Kilduff said.

The Minutemen had killed off the first penalty, and most of the second when Kramer picked up a loose puck in the slot and back–handed one past Kilduff.

UMass [0–2, 0–2 in Hockey East] held the lead throughout most of the game, but could not hang on in losing its second consecutive Hockey East game. The Minutemen couldn't sustain 1–0, 3–2, and 4–3 leads.

Providence [3–1, 1–0] entered the game after defeating Union the night before. With an injury to starter Bob Bell, PC coach Paul Pooley started back–up goaltender Dan Dennis in net.

Kilduff, who made a second consecutive start, made 27 saves, including no less than four breakaway chances by the Friars.

"My job is to keep the team in games," Kilduff said. "I did that tonight. They helped me out, and I picked up the team at times."

"Kilduff was unbelievable. You can't give him enough credit," defensemen Rich Alger said. "He's improved so much from last year. We're so confident with him behind us."

Wagar and Rob Bonneau (one goal, one assist each) connected for the second time in the game, putting UMass back in the lead at the 5:00 mark of the third period.

Wagar scored on a drop pass from Bonneau, after defenseman Mike Gaffney started the play by breaking up a PC rush at his own blueline and springing Bonneau.

Chad Quenneville struck right back at 5:53 with a wrap– around from behind Kilduff to tie the score at four.

UMass opened the scoring a 3:54 of the first period when Tom Perry and Christopher Fawcett broke in on a two–on– one opportunity. Fawcett sent the puck across to Perry, who slid one past a defenseless Dennis for his first goal of the season.

The Friars got on the board at 8:40, as Stefan Brannare picked up his second goal of the year. Brannare won the face off in front of Kilduff and simply fought his way to the front of the net and beat Kilduff to the short side.

PC took the lead at 13:01 when defensemen Scott Balboni beat Kilduff with a slapshot to the upper–right hand corner. Quenneville won the draw back to Balboni and went to the front of the net to screen Kilduff.

The Minutemen closed out the period strong as Bonneau got his first goal, swooping around from behind the net to poke it past Dennis at 18:02.

At 19:13 of the first, captain Jayen Rissling stole the puck at center ice and sent Armand Latulippe into the PC zone. Latulippe's blueline slapshot deflected off a Friar defensemen and beat Dennis to put UMass on top.

The only goal of the second period was Providence's David Green at 17:49. Green scored his third goal of the year, deflecting in a Jay Kenney slapshot from the point to set up the third period all even at three.

UMass suffered a tense moment in the third period with about eight minutes left. Rissling took a hard shot to his knee, and was down on the ice for several minutes. After a short time, Rissling did return to the ice.

"It was scary at first. He is one of our key players, but we did regroup," Alger said.

Coach Mallen shuffled his lineup, inserting three new forwards into the attack. Two players who were considered to be main cogs in the offense were unavailable.

Sal Manganaro is out two months with a broken patella in his knee. Blair Manning has left the team and will play junior hockey in Seattle (see related story, page seven).

Dean Campanale, Josh Hoekstra and Tom Sheehan each played in their first game of the season. Defensemen Tiger Holland also saw action, with Tony Giusto sitting out. Mallen dressed all three goalies, as both Rich Moriarty and Brian Regan were back–ups.

"We have a lot to offer, this team played with a lot of heart. Tonight, we knocked on the door. We are going to do that to a lot of teams," Mallen said.

UMass drops to 0–3 last night as they fell to the Boston College 4–2 last night at Kelley Arena. Freshman Brain Regan got his first start for the Minutemen.

Sophomore Rob Bonneau and freshman Christopher Fawcett scored the only goals for UMass. The Minutemen will play thier first home game Friday against Colgate.

Funding ensures renovations for women's sports

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Massachusetts Gov. William Weld announced yesterday that he had filed a $7.4 million bond to improve athletic facilities for women's sports teams at the four campuses of the University of Massachusetts to help comply with Title IX regulations.

"This funding is going to ensure that UMass women benefit fully from Title IX while giving them the resources to bring home even more athletic titles," Weld said.

Weld made the announcement at a ceremony on the State House lawn that included speeches by Weld, Lieutenant Governor Paul Cellucci, Secretary of Education Piedad Robertson, University President Michael K. Hooker and an athlete from each of the four UMass campuses.

"We believe women's sports should never be an afterthought," Cellucci said. "We want them to be a raging success. This funding is going to help build top notch facilities for women throughout the state."

Strong support from women's caucus

The legislature is expected to vote on the bill following next week's election. The bill has the support of the women's caucus, which Hooker believes will help push the bill through smoothly.

"It has the support of the women's caucus, which is pretty strong," Hooker said. "I can't imagine that the men in the legislature would deny the women's caucus this bill."

UMass Associate Athletic Director Elaine Sortino agreed.

"It would be like voting against God, America, your mother and apple pie," Sortino said.

Title IX is part of the 1972 Education Act which requires any schools that participate in athletics must provide equal opportunities for men and women.

Hooker said he is pleased with the bill and is eager to continue the improvement of women's sports throughout the University system.

"My goal is to take UMass beyond Title IX, and be the first university system in the nation to do so," Hooker said in his address." We are well on our way toward ensuring unprecedented opportunities for our female athletes, far beyond what the law requires. We are now moving to make UMass the national model for gender equality."

Kyri Sparks, co-captain of the Minutewomen field hockey team, spoke to the assembly on behalf of the UMass sports teams.

"The administration and the legislature have done a tremendous job, and we are very appreciative," Sparks said. "This is another step along the way to total equity. As an athlete and the services I receive, I feel equal."

UMass–Amherst will receive $2.7 million from the bond. The money will go to improving the fields and locker rooms for field hockey, soccer, lacrosse and softball, while the newly instated women's crew team will get shells, launches and motors.

Garber Field to get turf

Richard F. Garber Field, which is currently used by men's lacrosse and both soccer teams, will likely get lights and Astroturf, to be used for field hockey and both men's and women's lacrosse. A new facility, to be used by both soccer and softball, would be placed in the southwest corner of campus, possibly on the fields next to the William D. Mullins Center.

The move is particularly significant to field hockey and lacrosse.

The majority of Division I college field hockey is played on the artificial surface. The absence of a facility with Astroturf has left the Minutewomen at a disadvantage when they are preparing for road contests. Two teams, North Carolina and James Madison, refused to play UMass this season on grass, forcing the games to be played at alternate sites.

The turf will also allow UMass to host tournaments such the Atlantic 10 Championships.

"The record UMass field hockey has had, having to play on a grass surface is amazing," said Megan Donnelly, head coach of the UMass field hockey team. "This puts us finally on even-footing with the other top programs in the country in terms of facilities and opportunities for the athletes."

In recent years, New England weather has made Garber Field unusable at the beginning of the lacrosse season. The snow has forced teams to practice on various parking lots, leaving them unprepared for the opening of the season.

The turf will allow them to open their season on time, regardless of weather.

If the bill passes, these renovations are expected to begin shortly after.

"We hope it will pass after the election, and we can start renovations almost immediately," Hooker said. "By next fall, we could have new facilities on each of the campuses."

Sortino said she was pleased by the announcement.

"It is going to keep us in the direction that we've been going," Sortino said. "We really needed to do this, in terms of our facilities. We've had women's teams in the top 10 for years, but it's getting tougher and facilities make a difference.

"It takes good facilities to attract recruits. One of the areas that we had fallen behind was facilities. This move is a real catapult for our women's teams."

UMass–Dartmouth received $2.8 million which will go toward construction of women's soccer and softball fields and other training facilities. UMass–Lowell's $810,000 will be used to renovate its women's athletic fields and locker rooms, while UMass–Boston will get the remaining $1.1 million to build an addition to its Clark Athletic Center.

Student's health improving rapidly

AMHERST — Daniel P. Boudreau, a University of Massachusetts freshman, is currently hospitalized after being stabbed on North Pleasant Street early Sunday morning.

Boudreau, 18, is in stable condition at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. He is improving rapidly, after suffering from multiple stab wounds and lacerations in the head, side and back, and a collapsed lung, according to his father, Walter Boudreau.

The main problem facing Boudreau's recovery is raising the lung back up so that it can function properly, his father said.

He added that he is offering a reward of $1000 to anyone with any information leading to the arrest of the assailants.

Boudreau's parents said they are planning to stay at a local hotel until he recovers.

"This was a vicious attack. Someone out there that is very dangerous and is still among us," Walter Boudreau said.

At 1:15 a.m., an ambulance was sent to Delta Upsilon fraternity on 778 North Pleasant St. where the Amherst Police said Boudreau retreated after being attacked.

Boudreau, a Kennedy tower resident, was picked up at DU and brought to Cooley Dickinson.

He was one of five people engaged in a fight with another group of young men, police said.

The fight started after a group of hitchhikers allegedly began making hand gestures and yelling at the car Boudreau was in, police said.

The hitchhikers were heading south on North Pleasant Street, while the car was heading north. The car turned around and parked next to the group, police said.

The young men got out of the car and a fight ensued. Boudreau was standing by the car when one of the men struck him, police said.

He got up and was struck again. He thought he

Gunman to undergo psychiatric exam

Defendant to be charged with four felonies if found competent

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The man accused of firing a semiautomatic rifle at the White House was charged with four felonies and ordered to undergo a psychiatric exam Monday.

Prosecutors said a letter taken from his truck "raises questions whether he is competent." U.S. Magistrate Deborah Robinson refused to release the handwritten letter, which was taken from Francisco Martin Duran's pickup. She ordered him returned to court Wednesday, after the exam, for a competency hearing.

U.S. Attorney Eric H. Holder Jr. said authorities had recovered two letters — the one in the truck and another Duran was carrying when he was seized outside the White House.

Also found in the truck, according to prosecutors, was a shotgun, an arsenal of ammunition, a gun magazine, a machete, sleeping bags and a stuffed animal.

Officials have previously indicated the letter in the truck was an explanation of how Duran's possessions were to be distributed to his wife and son in event of his death.

In his first court appearance, Duran, 26, stood and stated his name, raised his right hand and swore to tell the truth. He wore a dark polo shirt and jeans into the highest security courtroom in the federal courthouse — one with bullet-proof plastic separating spectators and reporters from the judge, attorneys and defendant.

Duran sat up for most of the 15-minute hearing, but bent over during a conference at the bench to read a handwritten note. Assistant U.S. Attorney John Finnegan told the magistrate that Duran's letter "brings into question whether the defendant is competent to proceed."

Holder said later the request for the 24-hour psychiatric evaluation was "not an indication that we believe he is incompetent." Nor was it, he said, an indication that prosecutors thought Duran "was at the time of the offense insane."

Competency at this stage means the defendant can understand the charges against him and can assist his attorney, public defender Leigh Kenny.

Kenny said she had no concerns about Duran's competence at this time.

If Duran is found competent after Wednesday's hearing, there will be a preliminary hearing in which prosecutors would have to present enough evidence to justify continuing the case.

He was charged with possession of a firearm as a convicted felon, destruction of federal property, assault on a federal officer and use of a firearm during the commission of a crime of violence.

Prosecutors said he could receive as much as 35 years in prison if convicted of all four counts.

Holder said other charges might be filed later.

Prosecutors would not discuss a possible motive for Saturday's shooting, in which a man fired 20 to 30 shots at the White House through the iron fence on Pennsylvania Avenue with a Chinese-made semiautomatic rifle. Eight shots hit the building.

Treasury Secretary Lloyd Bentsen, whose department includes the Secret Service, said options officials are considering for increasing security include closing parts of Pennsylvania Avenue and stationing more guards on the White House sidewalk.

Court papers said Duran pleaded guilty on March 21, 1991 to felony assault while in the Army. He was sentenced to five years at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and in February 1993 was dishonorably discharged.

Holder said prosecutors would argue at the preliminary hearing that Duran should be held without bail.

Duran telephoned his family after disappearing Sept. 30 and said he was never coming back and might be dead soon, according to Joe Gordon, agent in charge of the Colorado Springs office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

New director appointed for center

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

Visiting assistant professor of comparative literature, Edwin Gentzler, has recently been appointed as the new director of the translation center at the University of Massachusetts.

Appointed by Lee Edwards, dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, Edwards said Gentzler has superb qualifications as well as the energy needed for the job.

"Gentzler has both the academic credentials and business connections necessary to help expand the operations of the translation center in the 1990s," Edwards said.

The translation center, presently located in South College, serves in helping students as well as organizations in Massachusetts with translation and interpretation needs. The center serves as a base for commercial, academic and literary translation.

"We are trying to make the center a top priority for the college," Edwards said.

Currently, a goal of the center proposed by the translation committee, is to expand the operation allowing businesses and public organizations in Massachusetts, as well as out of state programs, to increase the use of cultural connections and language resources found at the Amherst campus.

"The customers are finding out the University is providing services and can make use of resources and international connections," Gentzler said.

"It's a great chance for the private sector to work along with the University," Gentzler said. "We are now doing more jobs with clients that are not part of the University such as Yankee candle and Spalding Sport International."

The translation center makes use of undergraduate, graduate and teaching assistants as well as individuals from the Amherst community to translate various materials ranging from student medical records to professional advertising broachers.

"The center provide jobs for students with different ethnic backgrounds," Gentzler said. "I can use the students to help local business people."

Gentzler said students are able to make use of their language skills by providing tips for those interested in opening businesses in foreign countries.

Students will have the opportunity to base their work schedules at the center around their school schedules, Gentzler said.

At the present time, Gentzler said he does not have as many translators as he would like and encourages interested students to visit the center.

"I'm looking forward to working with young people and getting them experience in the real world," Gentzler said.

Author of the book, Contemporary Translation Theories, Gentzler said obtaining this position will provide for him numerous opportunities to work with student translators in the future.

Gentzler has teaching experience in translation at universities such as Utrecht located in Holland, Leuven in Belgium, and Warwick in England. Gentzler has also worked as an administrator at the International Writing Program at the University of Iowa.

Population growth and development problem addressed at int'l conference

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

A lecture discussing the findings of International Conference on Population and Development will be held tonight at Smith College.

The lecture will discuss three aspects of this U.N. conference and what the countries of the world, especially the United States, have agreed.

The conference, held in Cairo, Egypt, was the third conference called by the United Nations. The first was held in Romania 20 years ago. The second was held in Mexico City 10 years ago.

"This conference was held to finalize a document to give all nations guidelines as how to deal with population growth and development," said Anita King, co-chair of the population committee of the Pioneer Valley Sierra Club, one of the lectures co-sponsors.

"The one thing that correlates most closely with small families is the education of women," King said. "Population stabilization depends on the status of women."

King said 300 million women in the world do not have access to family planning. They are unable to obtain contraceptives, and that leads to population growth.

King also said population growth and development affects the environment for growing populations which lead to deforestation and soil erosion. The population then migrates from the ruined area to other nations which then leads to war, King said.

The subject of consumption will also be discussed. The average United States citizen consumes six times the natural resources (oil, food, raw materials) at the average non-U.S. citizen, King said.

It is estimated that $17 billion a year will be needed for family planning and woman's health alone. According to the Cairo agreement, the United States must pay $1 billion of that money, King said.

"A billion dollars a year is the cost of one B–2 bomber," King said.

Speaking at the lecture will be Karen Kalla, the international population director for the Sierra Club, Fred Meyerson of Planned Parenthood of Connecticut and Yale University, and Nalini Visvanathan of the School for International Training of Brattleboro, Vt.

The lecture will be held at 7:30 p.m. in the Browsing room of the Neilson Library tonight.

Potential juror dismissed by Judge Ito

Two panelists chosen for pool after second round of questioning

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A prospective juror in the O.J. Simpson murder case wept Monday as he revealed how close he came to killing a fellow soldier during the Korean War.

"I have had a very personal and dynamic experience with the will to commit murder," the man volunteered under questioning by Superior Court Judge Lance Ito. "I know what powers can be brought to play."

Asked to explain, his voice trembled and he said, "It's a very strong, emotional experience, and I may not be able to get through it."

At the judge's urging, the man wiped his eyes and launched into perhaps the dramatic story told yet during the exceedingly personal questioning of prospective Simpson jurors.

The 61-year-old sheet metal worker said he was serving in the Army during the Korean War and endured "a year of harassment" from a fellow soldier.

"Then there was the proverbial straw that broke the camel's back," he said. "There was great anger and fear. I wanted to kill this man."

One night, as he stood guard duty outside the barracks where the man slept, he removed his gun from his shoulder, placed a finger on the trigger and contemplated shooting into the barracks to scare him out into the open so he could shoot him.

"But I thought, the minute I pull this trigger, I will be out of control," he said. "There were 32 men sleeping in that building. I had two 15-round magnums."

His voice broke and he began to cry. "It took all my strength, physical, emotional and spiritual, just to take my finger off the trigger."

Simpson watched with rapt attention in the silent courtroom. The judge and lawyers conferred at the bench and agreed to dismiss the man. Ito thanked him for his candor.

Later, two panelists were approved to join the pool of prospective jurors from which attorneys will try to choose the final jury. The judge planned to give lawyers the day off Tuesday to consider their choices, then let them begin exercising peremptory challenges Wednesday.

Peremptory challenges enable attorneys to remove any prospect without stating a reason. But they can't dismiss someone because of race or gender.

Twelve jurors and eight alternates will be selected to hear the case against Simpson, who is on trial for the June 12 slayings of his ex-wife Nicole Brown Simpson and her friend Ronald Goldman.

******

In other developments:

• Deputy District Attorney William Hodgman disclosed that his office received a tip that a prospective juror who already has been through the first round of questioning gave opinions about the case at work. The call came from someone who said the prospective juror was a co-worker. The judge said he would take up the matter Wednesday.

• Simpson suffered an attack of intestinal problems over the weekend, his attorney said. The judge inquired how he was feeling Monday morning and Simpson replied: "Pretty good."

Homecoming is all about kissing a pig

At Kent State, one of the main highlights of the Homecoming celebration is the Kiss the Pig contest. The contest is held yearly in order to help raise school spirit.

Students and faculty members are nominated by people dropping money into a container with their name on it. The person with the most money — gets to kiss Orville the pig.

The student who won said he kissed the pig right on the snout. He also said it was a "fun activity," and it didn't bother him at all.

Parents charged for disorderly conduct

The Arizona Daily Wildcat of the University of Arizona, reported, "a softball bat-wielding father and his wife" were arrested for threatening their daughter's boyfriend.

The 17-year-old boy ran to the police station and said he and his girlfriend were talking outside a sorority house when his girlfriend's mother came running out yelling at him. Then the father allegedly jumped out from a bush and chased the boy with a bat.

At the police station, the father screamed, "I'll get you smart-aleck son of a bitch. Wait until this is over . . . I'll kill you, you son of a bitch."

If you cheat, we will tell

After two years of work, students and professors at George Washington University have finally completed a new honor code.

The honor code calls for an honor pledge. Students would have to sign a written statement promising that they would not cheat or be involved with any kind of academic dishonesty. The pledge also makes the students promise that they would have to report anyone who does cheat.

A majority of the students, over 79 percent, voted in favor of having the honor code.

Condom shopping on the Internet

In the Boston University paper, The Daily Free Press, an article reported on a new on-line catalog called Condom Country that is available through Mosaic on the Internet.

The catalog was developed to promote safe sex and to provide information about AIDS and the importance of condoms.

Each condom is described on the screen and shown, in detail, what the condom looks like. Customers can either just browse through the catalog or make a purchase.

The catalog is run by the cartoon mascot, Prophylactic Pete, who speaks to you and tells you about all of the different condoms available.

Students can direct their way to better careers

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

It's never too early to begin preparing for a career in the future.

University Directories, the nation's largest publisher of telephone directories, is providing students the opportunity to get ahead in the post-graduation job hunt with a summer sales Internship.

"After this internship, I had seven job offers and I can attribute every one to University Directories," said Ben Lawrence a regional sales manager for University Directories. "It helps to get your foot in the door."

Each summer, over 200 students interested in careers in the fields of sales and management participate in the 11- week program.

During this time, students learn about presentation skills, closing sales and the ethics of professional selling.

Students are chosen for the program by an application and interview process, Lawrence said.

While attending a training program in Chapel Hill, N.C., students learn basic sales skills such as how to deal with business owners on a professional level as well as meet with sales representatives from established companies.

"They packed so much information into the program," said Alysa Roth, a junior communications major at the University at Massachusetts. "They gave you a lot of incentive."

Roth said in her first year of the internship she trained as a sales representative and in the following summer as a sales manager.

Students training as sales representatives attend the training program for one week and those working in sales management attend the program for two weeks. All traveling costs of students involved in the program are taken care of by University Directories.

For the next 10 weeks, the task of the student is to sell pages in the back of the directory in the market to which they are assigned.

Students participating in the program have an earning potential of $6,000 for a management position and $3,000 for the position of a sales representative.

"It was definitely a good experience," Roth said. "It has given me more confidence in everything I do."

Lawrence said for students who succeed in the internship, their chances for a career in the job market improve greatly.

A placement agency at University Directories works to arrange meetings with representatives from companies such as Procter and Gamble and Wallace Computers to obtain full time positions for student interns.

The United States won't seek action against Bosnian violations

By Carl Hartman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States would be unlikely to participate in military action against the Muslim-led Bosnian government for its reported violation of a U.N. demilitarized zone, a State Department spokesman said Monday.

"We, of course, would like to see the exclusion zones respected," said Acting Spokeswoman Christine Shelly. But she said, "It's hard to imagine the United States participating in that kind of an action against Bosnian government forces when they clearly have been the overwhelming victim in the aggression by the Bosnian Serb forces."

She said the Bosnian government's violation of the zone could be an indication of its frustration that the Bosnian Serbs have not accepted the proposed peace plan.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher also rejected the suggestion by the top U.N. commander that NATO warplanes might attack the Bosnian government forces.

"We don't see any occasion for its," Christopher said in Casablanca, Morocco, where he was attending a Middle East-North Africa meeting on economics.

The threat was raised by Lt. Gen. Michael Rose, the U.N. commander, as the Muslim-led Bosnian government pressed its most successful offensive in the 31-month war.

Bosnian government forces are reported to have gone into a demilitarized zone on Mt. Igman, south of Sarajevo, and attacked Serb forces last week.

Shelly emphasized the U.S. view that the Bosnian Serbs are the aggressors in the fighting and that differences should be settled peaceably. She added that recent Bosnian military success could bring a settlement closer.

"They are exercising their right to defend themselves by force of arms," she said.

"And if the results that they have scored in this last week or so have the effect of bringing some additional pressure on the Bosnian Serbs to get them to sit down and start talking peace, certainly that would be movement in the right direction," Shelly said.

In the past five days, government forces have dealt the Serbs their worst setback of the war. Striking out of the besieged pocket of Bihac, they have retaken almost 100 square miles (250 kilometers) of territory in northwestern Bosnia.

Shelly said the U.N. forces on the ground have not asked for any action against the Bosnian government.

Wanda waited night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had sedated the man in the yellow hat and had commandeered the Prince of Malawi's limo, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with Silly little Monkeys.

Vote Yes on Question 2

Keeping the seat belt law in place in the upcoming election is important for the safety of all travelers on Massachusetts roadways. By voting "yes" on Question 2, residents will be avowing their belief in the utility and benefits of seat belts.

Question 2 is a referendum on an existing law passed by the State Senate and the House of Representatives on Jan. 4. Opponents hope to repeal the law, as they did with the first one passed in 1986.

A mandatory seat belt law will save lives. Many of us, blind to the fact of our mortality, are short–visioned and fail to see the need to wear safety belts. In many cases, people will only use seat belts after they or someone they know has been in an accident.

Since many of us lack the wisdom to see the value of buckling up, a mandatory state law will serve as a preventive measure which could potentially save a life.

An increase in the use of seatbelts lowers insurance premiums and reduces the medical costs that can result from hospital bills after accidents. It will prevent tragedies on our roadways.

Opponents of the seat belt law claim seat belts are not needed to save lives. Voters repealed the first Massachusetts mandatory seat belt law and opponents claim a mandatory seat belt law is a violation of individual rights and the freedom to choose whether or not to buckle up.

Despite the arguments, wearing a seatbelt is just common sense, a preventive measure that is simple and should be second nature. The seatbelt law doesn't take away anyone's freedom; it simply prevents someone's exercise of so–called "freedom" from ending in tragedy.

Vote Yes on 2.

Finding the truth in the myth of cannabis

Cannabis is the so–called "miracle plant," and for all intents and purposes, cannabis is banned in the United States, because of marijuana.

No one has ever overdosed on marijuana. No one has ever died from it. Hundreds of thousands have died as a direct result of tobacco and alcohol. Marijuana is illegal for the same reason that these drugs are legal: political maneuvering, temporary crises and accidents of history.

When Britain hooked China on opium, they used the drug's influence to increase labor production. In the United States, the same was done with Blacks and cocaine. In both cases, the newly–addicted peoples eventually rose up against their harsh working conditions. The drugs were conveniently blamed.

Peter J. Orvetti

Something similar happened here. When Mexicans began moving back into the southeast United States several years after the United States conquered that territory, community racists blamed the new residents for a crime wave that was sweeping the territory. Trouble was, there was no crime wave. Still, a lot of Mexicans suffered for it.

What distinguished the Mexicans from the Americans? The Mexicans enjoyed a drug called marijuana. The racists implicated this drug as the cause of the nonexistent crime wave. It was banned.

Not too many years later, during alcohol prohibition, a Federal Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs was created. It was the predecessor to today's DEA, and used similar Fourth Amendment–defying tactics. Throw in a racist chairman who called for nationwide arrests of reefer– smoking jazz musicians — Black, of course — and you've got yourself a top–priority illegal substance.

But it wasn't over yet for marijuana. Like all political decisions, big business had the final say. Worried about the growing number of uses for hemp, business leaped into the anti–marijuana movement, realizing that stopping marijuana would effectively stop hemp. The FBNDD chairman's uncle, who just happened to be one of the nation's most powerful business leaders, was among the loudest voices.

So bigotry and business ended both hemp and marijuana in the United States. Excuses were needed in case anyone ever thought to ask why. Answers were given; money was spent on "public service" ad campaigns. No one ever bothered to find out if the answers were true.

They aren't.

• Marijuana does not make a person lazy and unmotivated. This is a myth first used against the Mexicans. Some cultures use marijuana to aid potential. How was this myth disproved? By a study done by the United States Army.

• Marijuana is not a "gateway drug." A vast majority of the medical community no longer even accepts the gateway drug theory. In fact, research is being done into using marijuana for treatment of crack addicts who are trying to overcome their addiction. In Amsterdam, decriminalization of marijuana led to a decline in both marijuana and heroin use.

• Marijuana does not kill brain cells. This falsehood is based on a study performed during the anti–marijuana resurgence of the 1970s. A medical review board condemned this study as poorly performed. A similar experiment, done properly and with better equipment, found that there was no brain cell loss.

• No one has ever overdosed on marijuana. No one has died from marijuana. No one gets hooked on marijuana. Marijuana is not chemically addictive — you are more likely to get hooked on coffee or chocolate. Marijuana users have no withdrawal symptoms if they stop using it.

• Marijuana users rarely chain smoke, and marijuana contains no ingredient like tobacco. In fact, the THC in marijuana is a decongestant.

Is this a call to bongs? Should we all start smoking marijuana? No, of course not. But after decade of government interference and disruption, and the use of unconstitutional means to prevent marijuana use, we should examine decriminalization.

With hemp's many uses, and with more dangerous drugs legal, the government's claim to be protecting the citizenry through combatting marijuana is ludicrous. The choice should lie with the individual. But we cannot make honest choices if all of the facts presented are lies. We are entitled to the truth.

Letters to the Editor

Kennedy has earned votes

To the editor:

How soon we forget! Sixty years ago 50 percent of the population were living in poverty, 25 percent of Americans were out of work. Those were the good old days. Every major program created in this country to improve the quality of life of its citizens has been created by the Democratic Party. I can't name one major program the Republican Party can take credit for. As America grew and prospered, the Democrats created the Middle Class. I would also venture to say that the majority of executives in business today received some form of government assistance. The basic creed of the Democratic Party is that it is responsible for the welfare of its fellow Americans and people like Senator Kennedy will never desert its basic principles.

Reagan's presidency saw attempts to cut programs for the handicapped, milk and lunch programs as well as social security. He denounced such programs as food stamps, the minimum wage and urban renewal. As Tip O'Neil once said, "When it comes to giving the tax breaks to the wealthy, the guy has a Heart of Gold." He wanted to take from the truly needy and give to the truly greedy.

The loss of jobs in Massachusetts and throughout the nation is a result of defense cutbacks, downsizing in industry as a result of poor management and corporate greed (the exporting of jobs for lower wages to enrich their stockholders instead of investing in jobs in America). Romney is not the solution, he is part of the problem. Greed is the greatest problem that exists in the world today. You only have to look at professional sports to get a small glimpse of what is wrong with society today.

Kennedy is a very gifted Senator and is so acknowledged by his peers. His work gets bipartisan results. He has secured the votes of conservatives as well as moderates to pass legislation in the last year. Effectiveness in Congress is too often a function of pork and special interest deals. It's rare that it comes from genuine bipartisanship, but that is what sets the Kennedy style apart, media images to the contrary.

You could fill a book with legislation he is responsible for. Yes, he has a record and a damn good one. I don't think Massachusetts or the nation can forgo the likes of Ted Kennedy. He is not perfect but who is? He has EARNED your vote.

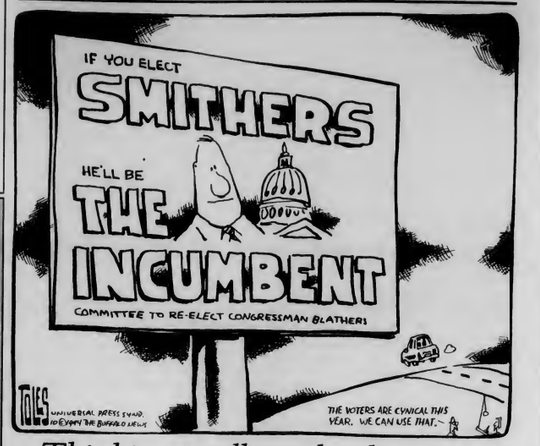
Opinion/Editorial



Thinking intelligently about sex

The marketplace of ideas is already cluttered with innuendos and allegations concerning "the deed."

One would think that people would tire of titillation. Apparently, this is not the case. It seems we are insatiable. Not many people want to openly discuss what goes on in their bedrooms, and the ones who do are usually bragging for no reason.

Many of us view sex as a personal, intimate affair that should be shared between two individuals, not spread out for public viewing. And yet, when we come across juicy tidbits of other people's sexual habits, the same people who are morally upright conducting their sex life watch eagerly as tales of Nicole Simpson's adventures are smeared on T.V. and in the news. America is a country filled with Puritanical voyeurs.

From where does this interest in other people's business arise? It's tough to pinpoint, but I'd like to believe that much of it comes from people being insecure. The reasons why The Joy of Sex and other sexual self–help books are so popular is that we really don't know if we're doing things right. When you take sex education class, all you learn is the ingredients; you don't learn how to cook.

No one wants to be viewed as inadequate, so we buy into this nonsense that there is a right and wrong way to have sex. We stifle our personal conversations, choosing instead to get our information from pop culture. Why people want to learn about sex from Madonna and Basic Instinct, I'll never know.

But the actual performance of the act isn't the only source of our confusion. AIDS and pregnancy are continuing risks, and recent concerns over harassment leave many people unsure of their place in the sexual continuum. Faced with these issues, many people choose to stay home Saturday night and take a bath. As a result, masturbation has become very trendy. It is a no risk, instant gratification. You never have to ask permission and you never have to worry about testing positive. And no one cares if you fall asleep afterwards.

Aside from all the problems associated with sex, people get and respond to strange signals from advertising. "Drink our beer, see pretty girl. Use our razor blades, see pretty girl. Drive our cars, see pretty girl." Everyone knows why the pretty girl is there. We are bombarded with images that imply and suggest sex without being explicit. Just once I want to hear an announcer say, "If you eat Pringles, you'll get laid." Sounds ludicrous, but it is the same message being presented and sold to the consumer daily, sans audio.

And of course, all this talk about sex does have the tendency to disturb those who can't separate reality from the make believe world of advertising. Obsessive love is a natural derivative of lonely people being told they should be getting more action than they do. Stalkers and rapists have become all too common, and domestic violence continues to be treated as something justifiable, something other than brash assault. A marriage license shouldn't be a license to kill. Millions of women live in fear that they will become a victim to someone's created sexual power trip. Orgasm is wonderful, but at what cost?

It could be argued that our inability to maturely discuss sex is a primary reason why many people are disturbed and obsessed. But few of us seem interested. We'd rather hear Howard Stern talk about vivacious lesbians, or watch the making of the Swimsuit Issue.

Perhaps if a coherent argument could be plastered on a billboard (bordered by a scantily clad anoretic model), then people would be willing to think intelligently about sex and work through many of the misinformations they hold. I get the feeling this may be too much to ask. We'd rather be lonely and confused.

The absurdity of the baseball strike

David Nash

"Our negotiations are not any different than any negotiations in a labor situation. Try to cross a Teamsters line and you'd end up in the East River."

A quote from a movie? No. A quote from the Federation of Interstate Truckers, the AFL–CIO or the United Federation of Teachers? No — actually that is a quote attributed to Bobby Bonilla, one of the New York Mets player reps, by The Record of Hackensack, N.J.

Threats, from a players union rep, to players. A union of baseball players. Things are definitely out of control now.

Everyone involved seems to be forgetting a few things. First and foremost — baseball and hockey are games, hence the name players. A game played for fun by little girls and boys everywhere and also played by men, who seem to want to act like little boys. The baseball strike has reached ridiculous proportions.

"I'm sitting out, losing a ton of money, so if you cross the line, things could go rough for you." "I don't throw balls, I throw fists." These words of wisdom are from John Franco, the other player from the Mets, quoted in the same article as Bonilla. His quote brings up a second issue — tons of money. There are those who believe ballplayers are worth everything they can get. Especially the players, the numbers they are asking for get more and more outrageous each year. Baseball is not the only one, the same can be said about basketball, hockey and football. Basketball's Glen Robinson reportedly was asking for a contract worth $120 million dollars — this from someone who has not played one second in the NBA.

The salaries in professional sports have been out of control for a number of years. Millions are given to marginal players who, without expansion, would have been selling real estate, farming or working in their hometowns.

It's not only the salaries that are out of control, guaranteed contracts and performance negotiations are crippling major sports. A player will have a good year and will want to renegotiate his contract, even if it has time left on it. The player and the agent negotiated and signed the contract, but because of one good year, it is no longer worth the paper it was printed on.

Guaranteed contracts mean that players will be paid, whether they play or not — if they are injured (game or non–game), just not good enough or whatever the reason — the team still has to play. There will be very few (if any) players that will turn down a paycheck or take a pay cut for a sub–par performance. With few exceptions (Frank Thomas, Ken Griffey Jr., Emmitt Smith) there are few players who improve or maintain their skills year after year.

The players current gripe is that the owners need to give up more of the money generated by the games. They seem to think that there is a bottomless well that money can be drawn from.

That money comes from the fans whose salaries average between $18,500 and $30,000 per year. These are the people who suffer most from strikes and lockouts and who are faced with inferior products in most cases. How many teams play for the championship of each sport? Two. That leaves a lot of teams not doing what they get paid to do — win.

Once negotiations have been completed and the players are once again back to "work," you can be sure rising prices won't be too far behind. Ticket prices, food, beverage and souvenir prices all will go up, as will players salaries. The fans will not be able to afford the luxury of a ball game much longer. Players will eventually have to cut their salaries or they will price sports out of existence.

It is really a pity that ballplayers think they are worth more money than police, fire fighters, educators, or for that matter, anyone who works nine to five just to make ends meet. They aren't. Maybe the next time one of their houses catches fire, they should call other ballplayers to put it out.

One final thing. Someone please tell Franco and Bonilla to save the tough talk for the movies. The only scary thing about them is the way they have been playing ball for the last couple of seasons.

David Nash is a UMass student.

Ani Difranco 'Out of Range' and in concert

COURTESY RIGHTEOUS BABE RECORDS
Ani Difranco

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Punk folksinger? Hey, why not? Ani Difranco may be one of the few artists who can actually appeal to both old folkies and young, moshing fools at the same time.

Already been called "a protest singer for the nineties," as well as "a modern day folk pioneer," Difranco has consistently remained staunchly independent throughout her short but prosperous career, while managing to create some of the most startling frank music around.

Rejecting offers from independent as well as major labels, Difranco has created and run her own label Righteous Babe Records since the early 90s. She will be performing songs from her latest release, Out Of Range, when she plays Chapin Hall at Mt. Holyoke College in South Hadley on Thursday.

Leaving home when she was only 15–years–old, Difranco learned early on about the in and outs of playing live. By the time she was 18 she had played every single bar in Buffalo countless times, and decided to move to New York City.

Draining her bank account and borrowing the rest from friends, Difranco managed to finance her first self–titled album.

"I don't know why anybody would work for somebody else if they could work for themselves," Difranco told The Boston Globe. "I have complete artistic control. I don't have to compromise myself politically of financially."

Since starting her own label, Difranco has recorded six albums and toured across the country playing her music and spreading her feminist message.

"We all have our own 'us and them', and my 'us' includes men and women of like mind who treat people with respect," Difranco said in the same interview. "There are occasionally men who will try and reduce me to being this angry militant."

While these fiery social commentaries as well as a skilled hand on the guitar, Difranco may be the first rising star to emerge on the folk scene in quite some time.

Linee Perroncel and her band Fella open the show.

Ani Difranco will play at Chapin Hall on the Mt. Holyoke College Campus Nov. 3rd at 8:00. General admission tickets are $12 in advance. Tickets are available at The Northampton Box Office.

Meandering Road to Wellville goes nowhere

By Jon Lupo

THE ROAD TO WELLVILLE
Directed by Alan Parker
With Anthony Hopkins, Bridget Fonda
Matthew Broderick & John Cusak

Halfway through The Road to Wellville, I realized something: I haven't heard this many fart and masturbation jokes since Porky's and its sequel, Porky's 2: The Next Day. Sure, we've got big stars — Oscar winners even — but no matter how you dress it up, it's still Anthony Hopkins making cracks about farting. At its best, the film could be tagged the first feel–good movie about enemas, at its worst, an overly–plotted "Benny Hill" episode gone un–hilariously amuck.

Director Alan Parker (The Commitments) directs a cast full of stars in what appears to be a comedy cum farce based on T. Corregessen Boyle's satirical bestseller about a quirky Dr. Kellogg (Hopkins) who runs a decidedly wacky health spa in the late 1800s. The inventor of corn flakes, peanut butter and the electric blanket, Dr. Kellogg believed in a clean mind (free of sex) and a clean bowel (free of well, you know).

His sanitarium is full of bizarre contraptions: electrocution therapy for flatulence, the aforementioned penchant for repeated enemas, etc. The spa also has its share of subplots: Bridget Fonda and Matthew Broderick play an estranged couple trying to cleanse their bodies of lust; Dana Carvey is Kellogg's disturbed adopted son, who is only there "to look at the nude ladies;" and John Cusak is a wannabe cereal tycoon hustled by a corpulent con man (Michael Lerner).

The big question in The Road to Wellville isn't as to where the film is going, but where isn't it going? Balancing subplots like they were spinning plates, Parker keeps piling on more protracted, unnecessary scenes, shifting the tone with every new scene.

There's some darker tension between Fonda and Broderick that's out of place (she's had a miscarriage, he's been an alcoholic and opium addict!), there's a series of deaths in the middle of the film that's never explained or followed up on and an eerie, abusive past shared by Hopkins and Carvey that feels like it's from a different movie. It also doesn't help that the Cusak plot is entirely pointless and unrelated, and that everything is cozily resolved in a farcical and unbelievable conclusion.

COURTESY MERRICK MORTON / COLUMBIA
Anthony Hopkins, Matthew Broderick and Bridget Fonda star in The Road to Wellville.

Unlike Boyle's novel, where the satire and social commentary were sly and well–noted, it's hard to tell in the film where the bathroom humor stops and the irony begins. . . or if it's even there. The performances are all skin deep and none are worth noting except for Dana Carvey's creepy and strangely endearing turn as the slightly demented, wholly mischievous Kellogg son. Yet it's a comment on the film where the most endearing character is the one that throws feces on people.

A final note to director Alan Parker; when you make a film with this many references to enemas, you're going to leave your audience squirming — and not in suspense.

Maya Angelou a stunner in Springfield

By Isabel Teresa
Collegian Correspondent

Maya Angelou spoke with inspiration and humor last Wednesday evening at Springfield Symphony Hall. Some of Angelou's literary accomplishments include the books I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings, Gather Together in My Name and Heart of a Woman. Her works also include volumes of poetry Maya Angelou: Poems and I Shall Not Be Moved.

Angelou dedicated the poem to "fat women, African American women, Native American women, Mexican women; all women of every race and color."

Angelou's visit was sponsored by the Springfield Public Forum Series, in addition to individual donations. Her talk was free and open to the public. The turnout for the event was greater than expected, which was apparent in the full seating of Symphony Hall.

Angelou's talk focused of her belief of the need for people to be "rainbows" to each other, and the importance of giving each other encouragement and support regardless of race, sex or class status. Angelou stated that we all deal with disappointment and shame in our lives, but there are rainbows in the clouds which are accessible to all.

Angelou cited a personal example of the rainbow metaphor. Some years ago she gave a talk about courage and was invited back to the same city four years later. At the end of the second talk, a White woman, of approximately the same age, approached Angelou and thanked her for her first lecture. The woman reported that Angelou's words convinced her daughter to stop attempting suicide.

While they were embracing and crying the woman's daughter, who had also attended the second talk unbeknownst to her mother, then joined them in the hug. Here the three women embraced and cried in support and encouragement of each other.

Angelou said that she considers herself very lucky to have been born a "Black American woman," and is very proud of her heritage.

Before the talk began, when it was announced that no one waiting outside Symphony Hall would be able to enter the building and hear Angelou speak, a few people left. However, the majority of attendants made themselves comfortable on the steps by standing outside, and listened to her words over a loudspeaker. There was a great sense of solidarity among everyone — young and old, men and women of every race and color — as they laughed, clapped and reflected on her words.

Angelou concluded her talk by reading "Phenomenal Woman," a poem she wrote about the dynamic power of the essence of a woman. She predicated the reading by saying that although men were also phenomenal, they would have to write their own poem.

Angelou dedicated the poem to "fat women, African American women, Native American women, Mexican women; all women of every race and color." Angelou added jokingly that "Phenomenal Woman" was "also for skinny women, because they deserve our sympathy, too."

UMass crew prove its speed at regatta

By Jody King
Collegian Staff

"We were in a race of our own and we showed our strength. We proved to ourselves that we are faster than the other crews," said University of Massachusetts coxswain Dena Hiller, after Saturday's Head of the Schuylkill Regatta in Philadelphia.

The Minutewomen placed fourth in a time of 16:28.9, finishing only :02.2 behind the first place collegiate finisher, George Washington University which crossed the line at 16:26.7.

This race contained an extra weight for the UMass boat. The UMass rowers were racing against some crews who they felt should not have beat them in the Head of the Charles, which was held last weekend. The Minutewomen used this race to prove to themselves that they are faster than Navy [16:38.0] and Temple [16:32.7], two boats that had beaten them at Head of the Charles.

According to UMass Assistant Coach Deana Runeman, the varsity eight boat had some problems in the Head of the Charles Regatta which cost them :06 to :10 seconds off their time, and which could have moved them up to seven spots ahead in the results.

Under one of the bridges on the course of the Charles, UMass tried to pass a crew which would not yield to them. This caused the Minutewomen to cut too close to a buoy, wrapping one rower's oar around the buoy and causing them a struggle to untangle the oar.

"[The Schuylkill] was a good race, and everyone was pleased," Runeman said. "The women got to redeem themselves and to beat a few of the crews that shouldn't have beaten them in the first place."

In the club eights race, the second UMass boat was the second collegiate finisher in a time of 17:33.3. Syracuse' crew finished :20.6 before UMass to take the first place finish for a collegiate team.

"We passed through three boats and that was enough for the women to turn their energy on," said UMass second boat coxswain Chris Stafford.

The Minutewomen pulled by the competition in the open club race, proving their speed in comparison to the other crews on the water.

"It was an exciting race. It was so much fun passing the competition," said UMass stroke Tara Longpre.

The UMass rowers expected to have a three week break before returning to action on the Charles, but plans have changed. The Minutewomen now have two weeks before competing again when they will row in the Tail of the Charles Regatta. The race, originally scheduled for Nov. 20, is now scheduled to take place on Nov. 12.

The Tail of the Charles will be the final head race for the rowers, completing their first season as a varsity squad at UMass. Head Coach Jim Dietz and his rowers are looking ahead to the sprint races in the spring.

"The way I coach, I train the women to build their strength and skills, and to be proficient in the fall," Dietz said. "We've used the fall to train and we will race in the spring. I think we are well ahead of where we were expected to be."

A-10 awards for UMass Athletes

Four UMass athletes earned Atlantic 10 Honor Roll distinction for their performances through Oct. 30.

From the women's soccer team, sophomore Rebecca Myers was named A-10 Player of the Week and freshman goalkeeper Danielle Dion was named Rookie of the Week.

Myers recorded her second hat trick of the season against Vermont and also recorded an assist against St. Bonaventure, helping the team to a 3–0 record for the week. The midfielder is tied for the team lead in goals with 10 and total points with 23.

Dion earned her third Rookie of the Week award for completing her seventh shutout of the year in a 1–0 win over St. Bonaventure. Dion did not give up a goal in any of UMass' five A-10 games. She has an overall goals-against average of 0.67.

Volleyball's Dionne Nash was named Player of the Week for her performance in the Minutewomen's three victories last week. Against Harvard, the sophomore outside hitter led the team with 15 kills while recording a career-best .500 hitting percentage. For the week she hit .403 with 34 kills and 22 digs.

Cross country's Melissa Langevin earned her fourth A-10 performer of the Week award for her outstanding running at the A-10 championships where she placed first overall. The sophomore is the first UMass runner to ever take first in the A-10 Championship, and ran the fourth fastest time in A-10 Championship history.

ers in the country, helped Nolan tremendously. Despite also lettering in basketball and softball in high school, there was no doubt which sport Nolan wanted to continue playing in college.

"I always knew I wanted to play volleyball," Nolan said. "Coaches came to club games and I started getting phone calls (for recruiting) my junior year."

Schools all across the country, from Colorado State, to Georgia Tech, to Boston College, as well as several California schools, began to express interest in Nolan.

"At first, I didn't really think seriously about UMass," said Nolan. "But when Leigh told me she had decided to come here, I began to think more about it. Once I visited, I really liked it here, and I knew I had a good chance to be part of a program that was just starting out."

Nolan has stepped right into the Minutewomen's starting lineup, where she has become the team leader in digs and is second on the team in total kills.

"I didn't expect to have a starting role, but Coach told me I would have an impact," said Nolan. "I think my club experience really helped me out."

"Lesley plays very consistently and passes the ball well," Kenny said. "She is not as noticeable as (outside hitters) Giza (Rivera) and Dionne (Nash) because she is more finesse than power, though she is starting to hit some powerful shots."

Nolan says it was difficult stepping onto a new team, especially one with four new starters.

"You have to get used to the way everyone plays," she said. "You can have six great volleyball players, but you're not a good team unless you can play together."

Kenny seems to get the most out of her players, and Lesley Nolan is no exception. She has been one of the Minutewomen's most consistent offensive threats, and credits Kenny for much of her success.

"Coach (Kenny) is the best coach I've ever had, by far," Nolan said. "She knows so much about the game and can tell me exactly what I'm doing wrong."

Personally, Nolan has not set many future goals. After all, she is only a freshman, and is still trying to figure out exactly how things work on this side of the country.

"I don't expect to be All-Atlantic 10 or anything like that," she said. "I just want to keep working on my hitting efficiency and stay near the top. I definitely want to work on communicating and talking a little more. I know Coach counts on me to be able to pass consistently."

As for the team, 20–3 is a record they never expected but are thrilled to have. The Minutewomen will go for win No. 21 tonight at the Curry Hicks Cage against Fairfield.

"Right now, we want to get a high seed in the A–10 and win the Tournament. Beating George Washington was one of our team goals, and we were able to do that," said Nolan, whose squad defeated the defending A–10 Champion Lady Colonials earlier this year in Washington D.C.

Rugby gains first playoff berth in three years

The Massachusetts men's rugby team has gained a playoff berth for the first time in three years following their 42–11 win at home against Boston University.

Saturday's game marked the end of the team's two game losing streak, and brought UMass back into the top four.

The game was delayed by a 15 on 15 crowd enhanced brawl, which nearly caused the referee to end the game with only 9:36 remaining. Greg Lisi, UMass A side wing, and one player from the BU team were suspended for one game. Lisi will be back on the pitch for the team's first playoff game.

"It was like watching a bunch of uncaged animals. I couldn't believe it," said a UMass spectator.

UMass senior second-row Steve Nesbit then stepped up to score the first try of his career. Nesbit's try was followed by three more tries to boost UMass' 31 point scoring gap.

Placing fourth in the standings of the elite New England premier league, the team prepares to travel to West Point in two weeks for their match up against Army in the first playoff game of the post-season.

"It should be a tough match," said UMass back Joshua Benson. "But we have been training hard and playing well."

A landmark in the season was the team's win against Harvard half way through their schedule. The 17–12 win was the first in the UMass–Harvard series since 1983.

"This is the best UMass team I've seen in years," said Harvard coach Al Baker. "I see no reason why I shouldn't see [UMass] at the Nationals."

Finishing their regular season schedule 4–3, only one win behind both UConn and Brown, the men's rugby team is looking forward to a good show in the playoffs.

Black Homecoming Weekend back again

Diverse offerings, special events on exciting weekend

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

This weekend marks the return of an event on hiatus for nearly a decade.

Black Homecoming, a celebration of the Black pride and history at the five colleges, has been revitalized at the University of Massachusetts, where it started in 1979. The festivities will commence on Nov. 4, and come to a close on Nov. 6.

Dormant since 1987, Black Homecoming "had always brought about unity for Black students on our campus," said chief organizer Mary Custard of CCEBMS (Collegiate Committee for the Education of Black and Other Minority Students).

Custard, who began reshaping the event early this summer with BMCP (Black Mass Communications Project) general manager Shannan Magee, also noted the magnitude of homecomings past.

"We usually had one or two major concerts. And we had speakers as well," Custard said.

The concerts and speakers had traditionally been brought in by AFRIKOMM and The Duke Ellington Committee, respectively; however, as the two seminal Black RSOs lost momentum in the late 80s, the decline of the homecoming followed in suit.

Thus, in September, Custard began holding weekly open meetings in New Africa House to assemble the various activities to take place. The support of the Black RSOs on campus was easily garnered, said Custard.

By October, the plan was all but ready for action.

On Friday, the Malcolm X Center is sponsoring the first activity, "Movie Night," at the New Africa House, followed by a BMCP–sponsored party at the Malcolm X Center.

Custard said she hopes to show a "Black classic from the 70s," such as Uptown Saturday Night or Superfly.

"We're thinking of showing an older film because they're so funny now," she said, commenting on the dated look of many of the films.

The next day is the first full day of Black Homecoming, kicking off with the Homecoming Parade, which marches from Amherst Commons through the University campus, culminating at the Campus Center. Representative banners from both Smith and Hampshire College are expected alongside the University RSOs.

Due to prior engagements relating to other Black-oriented events at the same time, both Mt. Holyoke and Amherst College will be in limited attendance, but both will participate in the planning meetings.

After the parade, the ALANA (Asian, Latin American, and Native American) Organization Fair takes place in the Campus Center Auditorium, where vendors will be selling multicultural wares.

The purpose of the fair, Custard said, is "for the organizations to meet and draw in first and second year students of color," in addition to people having the chance to purchase ethnically specific items they might not find elsewhere.

Nightfall brings the Black Student Union semiformal in the Campus Center Auditorium. In an elegant touch, a buffet dinner is included and a dress code will be enforced.

Students can shed the semiformal attire immediately thereafter for the ALANA Video Project Party at the Malcolm X Cultural Center, the final activity in a full and exhilarating day.

Custard said she hopes the 250–300 students from the campuses expected for the parade will be in attendance at the affair as well.

The ALANA Christian Alliance caps off Black Homecoming Weekend with a gospel concert on Sunday evening.

One of the focal points of the musical finale, besides the contagious energy that Black gospel spreads, is to reaffirm the importance of spirituality within the Black community.

With such a diverse plethora of ongoings, it almost seems a shame that many of the University's Black alumni will not be on hand to partake in the festivities.

Because the event was pulled together in such a short period of time, most of the graduates could not be notified in time.

"Many of [the graduates] don't even know about this Black Homecoming," Custard said. "But those who do know are happy it's being resurrected."

Custard and her committee intend to send out letters in the spring welcoming back those alumni unaware of this year's event. Also, Custard said the organizers of next year's homecoming will try to find a date accessible to all of the five colleges' schedules, in order to wholly represent the collective Black student community in the area.

The success of the new Black Homecoming '94 is largely dependent upon student participation in the activities planned for the weekend, but future homecomings will need alumni support to reattain the status lost during the dormant period.

Certainly though, this year's celebration is an impressive effort not to be missed.

ferent face; obviously, no team in the NFL is ignorant enough to mortgage its draft for the next five years like Minnesota did in the Walker trade.

Parcells has not been able to get gems on offense, other than the obvious superstars Drew Bledsoe and Ben Coates.

Guys like Michael Timpson and Vincent Brisby are being touted as the next great wide receivers in the league and aren't close.

However, because Parcells and his staff doesn't have anybody else, he must put up with Timpson's antics.

If he was on any of Parcells' teams in New York, Timpson would have been cut. In the Big Apple, Parcells had the juice to make his players listen.

It seems in New England, though, the inmates are running the asylum. The Patriots are an up-and-coming team, yet the fans who expected the playoffs and an AFC East title this season are sadly mistaken.

Cheap-shot artists running amok

It doesn't seem worth it for a team to trade its star quarterback for a 15-yard penalty.

Such was the case in the Dallas–Cincinnati game. Linebacker James Francis came in on a third down blindside blitz and leveled Troy Aikman, only a week after he suffered a concussion against Phoenix.

The late hit by Francis turned the game around; the pass, which was an incomplete, was called back and with the new set of downs, Dallas scored a touchdown and stole the game away from the winless Bengals.

Last season, quarterbacks dropped like flies in the NFL, and the injuries led to an unspectacular year of field goals.

If defensive players are allowed to pin their ears back and go full force after the opposing quarterback, they'll start dropping again.

Vinny Testaverde and Jeff George, along with Aikman, have suffered concussions over the last two weeks, and if the cheap-shots continue to pour in, the NFL will be trying to hype up a Super Bowl match-up of Steve Bono's Chiefs and Rodney Peete's Cowboys.

Not so. With their 19–9 win, the season sweep was complete.

"I was really pleased with our intensity versus Harvard. We came out the last few times we played them kind of flat," said Yarworth. "We were up 11–3 at the half and essentially took Harvard out of the game. They weren't ready for our level of play.

"So, that's good because that is what I've been harping on the kids about."

Mujica (.538 save percentage in 63 quarters played, 37 steals) solidified his status as one of the best goalies in the East with a 14 save performance, while adding three more assists to his season total.

Gonzalez and Limardo again led goal scorers with five each, and third leading point scorer sophomore Greg Menton (85 points in 111 quarters played) followed them up with four tallies.

In addition to getting the mental aspect of the game tightened down this weekend, Yarworth also was able to work on other points of the team's overall game. Especially those that will help the team most in this time of the season.

"Our counterattack was impressive, to say the least. We didn't have to work in the half court as much as I had expected to, because it was going so well," Yarworth said.

"I'd like to see us attack the drop-in zone defense a little better. So we're going to work on that this week. I think we'll see a few more zones this weekend when we get to Easterns.

"We're peaking at the right time in the season. The guys will have to show up next weekend and realize that each game is important. They can't just think about the final, because you got to get to the final to play it.

"Basically, it's time to go. I think we got all our parts in order now. They just have to work on the little things like extra-man play and defensive intensity, and we'll be there."

With the two victories at the playoffs, UMass improved it's record to 27-6 on the season.

The Minutemen also extended their record for victories in a season with 27. The previous record of 25 wins in a season was set in 1992.

The Far Side By Gary Larson

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You can win over someone an associate has alienated by appealing to their sense of humor. Keep your temper in check when disagreeing with instructions passed on by a supervisor.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Life seems particularly glorious now! A special friendship gives home life new importance. Co-workers see where you are headed and want to help.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Welcome a chance to right a wrong connected with your home life. Loved ones are eager to follow your lead. Attempt to unravel the mystery surrounding someone's odd behavior.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Follow the line of least resistance when coping with difficult people or situations. Devoting more attention to an older person's needs will pay off.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Make or participate in "romeo clean" about something that involves your interests. Romance moves into a more rewarding period. Your talents receive new notice from those who count. A parental instinct is rekindled.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Making a commitment will cement a valuable relationship. Try not to worry so much about tomorrow. Your guardian angel is clear in hand. An enthusiastic attitude toward work will motivate others. Romance is mostly happy.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Indulge your taste for intellectual challenges. You can cut certain corners when you have an old hand to guide you. Avoid getting dragged into other people's squabbles. Entertain a visitor from out of town.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A good time to clean out your office or the garage. A family member may need more help from you. Reassess your long-range career goals. Would you rather be doing something more creative?

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Be ready for both thrills and chills on that rather classic called "romance." You feel up one minute and down the next. The key to prosperity and respect is creative ideas. Friends contribute to your success.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You are the only one who can make your dreams come true. Business pursuits could gain a friendly relationship. Need a need for privacy. A daily period of meditation will restore your emotional equilibrium.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Keep your best planted firmly on the ground. Your hard work will produce a wonderful payoff. If you can help someone financially, do so if you are certain that they will appreciate it.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Tackle the most pressing problems first today; the smaller ones will take care of themselves. A writing assignment or public speaking engagement gives you a chance to really shine. Put your best foot forward.

UMass Hockey falls to Boston College

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL — Boston College scored three first period power play goals to set the tone in a 4–2 win over the University of Massachusetts hockey team Sunday, its third Hockey East loss in as many games.

This one proved that special teams really are special, even if they do not play that way. While the Minuteman power play has still not struck (0–for–19), UMass' problems with the Eagles centered more on its shorthanded situations, where BC was a productive three of eight.

Boston College	4
Massachusetts	2

"It's a big, big change for all of our players in terms of the intensity on penalty killing, and we're really having a hard time adjusting to it," said UMass Coach Joe Mallen.

As it did against Providence the previous night, UMass took an early lead when Rob Bonneau tucked a pretty feed from Dean Campanale past Greg Taylor at 1:59. Blair Wagar also assisted Bonneau's second goal of the season.

"We're not getting blown out of the building and I think a lot of people thought we would," Mallen said.

At 5:13, Springfield's Tom Ashe slapped a shot from straight ahead on the blue line that beat Brian Regan, who made a smashing 34–save debut. David Hymovitz assisted the power play tally.

At 12:03, Rob Laferriere burst down the right wing, then cut across before lifting the puck over Regan. Defensemen David Wainwright and West Springfield winger Don Chase assisted on the power play goal. This was the 79th career goal for the line of Laferriere, Hymovitz and Chase.

As in each of its first two contests, UMass lost another key cog of a comparably impotent offense. At 12:23, Tom Perry rammed his skate into the boards and suffered a sprained knee. Thus, UMass had lost a combined 24 goals, 38 assists (1993–94 totals for Perry and Blair Manning) and its most experienced Hockey East player (Sal Manganaro, broken kneecap).

UMass had two great bids on a power play of its own with Ken Hemenway off for hooking at 14:06. Rissling knicked the post and Wagar and Armand Latulippe squandered a 2–on–1.

At 17:59, Chris Fawcett served two minutes for a too many men on the ice violation. UMass failed to assign anyone to captain Ryan Haggerty, who camped out on Regan's left and promptly one–timed a Hemenway pass past a helpless Regan at 19:00, for which Ashe earned an assist as well.

BC dominated the first period in every phase of the game, particularly shots on goal, where they held a decisive 14–3 advantage.

The essence of the middle stanza was a five–minute major assessed to Clifton McHale, for hitting from behind at 11:25. Major penalties are non–releasable, so BC was shorthanded for the duration. Though UMass mounted four shots on Taylor, he smothered them all, and the best bid actually went to the Eagles, as Laferriere and Wainwright almost clicked on a 2–on–1.

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Tiger Holland and the University of Massachusetts hockey team lost its third straight Hockey East game on Sunday against Boston College.

Regan saved 22 of 25 shots through two periods, but made the final frame with the Eagles his own. During a two–man BC advantage from 4:37, he really turned heads.

Regan robbed Haggerty with his glove on a one–timer from Jamie O'Leary, whom Regan may follow in earning Hockey East Freshman of the Week honors. He then stoned Hymovitz twice in succession and to everyone's amazement, UMass killed the 5–on–3.

"I was a little nervous on the first couple shots, but once the puck drops, it's just another hockey game," Regan said. "I just want to start winning.

"I really didn't know what to expect, but from what everyone tells me about [Hockey East], the past three games have lived up to what it's all about."

"[Regan's] shown us a lot of quickness and a lot of determination," Mallen said. "On that 5–on–3 he was immense, and it's tough to make those saves under pressure."

At 10:10, Regan was not quite quick enough to stop a one– timer in the slot by Jerry Buckley, who neatly put away Chase's assist from the left circle. The sparse BC throng of 2,641 began chanting "Regan," but the Outstanding Goalie of the 1994 Hockey Night in Boston Tournament was named the No. 3 Star of the Game.

Fawcett drew the Minutemen back within two at 14:19, beating Taylor five–hole from the right circle off a Mike Gaffney assist. The goal was the first of Fawcett's collegiate career.

Parcells is not the same as he was with the Giants

Bill Parcells ain't what he used to be.

The man who used to strike fear in the hearts of his players when he led the New York Giants to Super Bowl championships is not the same one who stands on the sidelines for the New England Patriots every Sunday.

The fire in his belly has turned to utter dismay and frustration on his face as Parcells watches his team stumble out on the field and put forth efforts like New England did on Sunday.

Unlike in past years, though, there isn't a player with the demeanor of a Lawrence Taylor or a Harry Carson on the Patriots — someone who walks into the locker room at halftime when his team is getting creamed and subsequently tips tables of Gatorade and tosses chairs around the room.

Art Stapleton on the NFL

So it is left to Parcells, and, as old as he his and for what he's been through, the Coach doesn't have enough to scream and yell at his players.

There's the problem — by cleaning house when he first came to Foxboro, Parcells got rid of what he thought was excess baggage, namely Irving Fryar and Andre Tippett, whom he then made an assistant coach.

Those guys have the attitude. Those guys have been on the lowest of the low in New England and would have possessed the type of persona which the Patriots are now lacking.

"It's going to be up to the veterans to keep this team together. It was a very damaging loss. Hopefully we don't get discouraged. Hopefully we can pick the rookies up and get some wins before the end of the season," Maurice Hurst said on Sunday.

That's just it — there aren't any veterans on the Patriots. The team leaders are guys like Vincent Brown and Hurst, who don't know about winning and can't relate to Parcells' style of coaching.

A lot of fans in New England want to speculate and say that in two years, the Parcells–led Pats will resemble the Dallas Cowboys and challenge for the Vince Lombardi trophy. This could be nothing further from the truth.

When Jimmy Johnson began his five–year plan in Dallas, he kept some veterans on the squad who knew how to win while unloading the Eugene Lockharts and Herschel Walkers of the world.

Men's water polo sweeps competition

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

This past weekend at the Eastern Water Polo Association Playoffs, the University of Massachusetts men's water polo team beat surprise finalist Queens College 22–11, to both sweep the season competition and gain positioning for the top seeding in the Eastern Championships.

Sunday's victory at Brown University in Providence, R.I., ends EWPA competition for the No. 12 nationally ranked Minutemen and sets the path toward postseason pressures and possible glory.

Led by the top two goal scorers in the form of junior Luis Limardo (101 points in 92 quarters played) and senior co– captain Javier Gonzalez (106 points in 105 quarters played), who both scored six goals each, UMass faced Queens College for the third time this season.

In their first meeting on Sept. 17, the squad ran away with a 22–8 win. But at the Villanova Tournament in Philadelphia on Oct. 8, the Minutemen got their 28 minutes worth with a close, down to the wire 12–11 victory over the Wildcats.

The unexpected presence of Queens in the final, due to their win over host Brown University, set the team aback in mental preparation.

But for UMass Coach Russ Yarworth, it was a small test that the squad weathered well.

"We had kind of a little letdown at the beginning of the Queens game because we were anticipating playing Brown," Yarworth said. "But Queens pulled it off again. It's the second time they beat Brown this year, so I guess it wasn't an upset. It was for real.

"Queens physical style of play set us back on our heels a little bit. But we still took control of the game after we adjusted."

In Saturday's matches in the first two rounds, the action contained both ends of the emotional spectrum for the Minutemen. In the first round, UMass defeated the Massachusetts Institute of Technology by an undeceptive margin of 24–3.

The assist parade was in evidence as freshman Juan Carlos Limardo (60 points, 30 assists in 84 quarters played) and sophomore Ron Gonen (75 points, 51 assists in 101 quarters played) collected three apiece, with junior goalie Alex Mujica (19 assists this season) chipping in two.

In the second round, the men's team faced a familiar foe in the likes of the Crimson from Harvard University.

In their previous three meetings, all wins for UMass this season, the Crimson have given the Top 20 dwellers a run for their money. Besides the 16–10 win at the Cambridge Invitational on Sept. 10, UMass–Harvard have battled to final scores of less than two goals separating them.

Coupled with the end of the game altercation at the Minutemen's last home meet, it aspired to be a dandy.

Men's cross country finishes second

By Rich Wicker
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross–country team finished in second place this past weekend at the Atlantic 10 Championships, finishing behind the host team West Virginia.

The Minutemen, who finished third last year behind West Virginia and St. Joseph's, placed two sophomores, Matt Behl and Michael Maceiko, in the top 10.

"For the most part, my expectations were met," said UMass Coach Ken O'Brien. "We actually had West Virginia beaten for the first three and a half miles of the race.

"Most teams had their No. 1 runners in the top 10 and some teams had their No. 2 men in the top 10. At this point we had six guys in the top 14 spots."

The Minutemen went to West Virginia, the race favorite, with no false hopes. They realized that the Mountaineers were a very good team and that they would have to work hard to win.

"We felt as though that if we had a good day, they were within our grasp," O'Brien said. "The kids went down committed to trying to go after a team of that caliber.

"We are trying to be a team that can run week in and week out with a team like West Virginia. If you can do that you are going to end up winning your share. Up until this point we have made some progress, but we have not come this close."

The Minutemen are a young team with potentially good depth, but are in need of some consistency.

"If you look at the results over the year, we have had the kind of team that over the course of any given meet, can end up with a different top two," O'Brien said.

"There has been inconsistency in that on any given day. One or two guys show the flash or the peak of their performance and then they may fall back into fourth or fifth place. Then we see the upside of another runner.

"If we ever get to the point where all of those runners run like they did when they ran in the top two for us, we could be a top 20 team."

Behl (26:18) finished seventh and Maceiko (26:26) finished ninth while both earned All–Atlantic 10 Conference distinction. Ted Towse (26:57) finished 12th, Walter Stock (27:24) finished 21st and Paul Blodorn (27:26) finished 23rd.

The Minutemen knew that they had to be significantly better than they had been previously in the season.

"My expectations for the meet was to hopefully get the kids on track and focus on going into the race thinking that if we gave it all we had, we could beat West Virginia," O'Brien said.

The Minutemen finished with 73 points, St. Joseph's finished third with 75 points and Duquesne finished in fourth place with 115 points.

Following in fifth place was George Washington with 123 points, Rutgers in sixth place with 140 points, Rhode Island in seventh place with 158 points and St. Bonaventure finished in eighth place with 255 points.

The Minutemen will be in action next on Nov. 12, when they will compete in the IC4A Championships in Boston at 11 a.m.

UMass' record for the year now stands at 8–2.

Seniors set for home finale

Borges, Duffy, Hart and Sparks will play final home game

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

When the University of Massachusetts field hockey team takes the field this afternoon at 3:30 p.m. against Springfield College, it will be the regular season game for four Minutewomen seniors.

Each of the four players has left a different mark on the program.

Danielle Borges:

In her senior year, the All–America candidate emerged as an offensive leader, leading the team with 20 points.

"She gives everyone on the team a lot of confidence in themselves," Hart said. "She bridges the gap between the players and the coaches as well."

Natalie Hart:

Hart will be remembered as one of the top two–way players to come through the program in a long time.

"Natalie is our leader on the field," Borges said. "She's a very important presence to all of us."

Colleen Duffy:

As the only four–year starter, Duffy will be remembered not only for her passing and stick work on the field, but also for her spirited attitude off it.

"Colleen is the one who gets us psyched," Borges said. "She's the loud one. She helps us when we're upset."

Kyri Sparks:

After arriving as a non–scholarship player, Sparks worked hard and became one of the top defensive players on the Minutewomen.

"Kyri a good role model for younger players," Duffy said. "She gives them hope. If they work hard they can play."

After great careers, the players all said they will miss playing field hockey for UMass.

"I'm going to miss it," said Hart. "I really enjoyed playing for UMass."

"This game is kind of the culmination of four years," Sparks said. "It's been exciting. There's not a day I would trade."

"It's going to be an emotional day," Duffy said. "I've been taking every day like it was my last."

"I'm going to miss it. I'm trying not think about it because if I do, I'll get sad," Borges said. "It means a lot, because its my last game on my home field. I'm looking forward to it, and I'm trying to not let it upset me or affect how I play."

UMass Coach Megan Donnelly said that although it will be hard to replace their play, she will miss their personalities more.

"They were unique talents with very individual things that they bring to the team," Donnelly said. "What I'll notice the most is the absence of those people. The best way to put it is that every time I see them, I smile. They're a good group. I'll miss them."

The game will be the end of two other eras as well.

If the bill presented to the legislature yesterday is passed, the Minutewomen could be playing their home games next year on Astroturf laden Garber Field.

"It's nice to be seniors and to be able to play the last game on Totman," Hart said.

"I liked Totman Field," Borges said. "I'm glad I played all four years here."

It will also be the final game for Springfield College in Division I. The once proud tradition will decrease its program to Division III status.

Nolan is a star for UMass volleyball

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

A whole different world.

To Lesley Nolan, a freshman outside hitter on the Massachusetts volleyball team, the East Coast is an area of the country that is still unfamiliar to her.

However, the native of Mission Viejo, Calif., is very familiar with a volleyball court where she has made a big impact in her first season for the 20–3 UMass volleyball team.

"Everything is different out here," Nolan said. "Even the sport is a little different."

Nolan was born in nearby Salem, Mass., but has lived most of her life on the West Coast. She began playing volleyball her freshman year at Santa Margarita high school.

"Volleyball is the thing to do in California, it's huge out there," Nolan said.

After a successful freshman year, Nolan tried out for the prestigious Mission Valley Volleyball Club and to her surprise made the team, where she played alongside future UMass teammate and current freshman Leigh Readey.

"I don't even think I realized how big making that club was at the time," Nolan said. "I'd say about 100 girls tried out and only 10 made it. In California, high school is not enough, you have to play club to stay on top."

"Lesley is the kind of player who you always know will play well," said Massachusetts Coach Bonnie Kenny. "She is always steady, and she will always perform."

The year round practice, first rate coaching and experience of playing against some of the best high school play-

PVTA bus hits truck on Rte. 116

One passenger injured, bus driver is hospitalized after noontime collision

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

SOUTH HADLEY — The driver and a passenger of a PVTA bus were taken to the hospital by ambulance yesterday afternoon after the bus collided with a tractor trailer truck on Route 116.

Kelly M. Daisley, a 1994 University of Massachusetts graduate, was driving the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) bus operated by the UMass Transit Service when the accident occurred, according to University spokeswoman Karin Sherbin.

Daisley was taken by ambulance to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, Sherbin said.

Hospital officials said Daisley was in stable condition and was administered tests late yesterday afternoon in the emergency room.

A passenger on the PVTA bus was taken away by ambulance, according to David Rhodes of the Amherst Police Department.

Police officials would not release the passenger's name and did not have any information on the passenger's condition.

According to Rhodes, the driver of the tractor trailer truck did not require medical attention.

Rhodes said the collision occurred at about 12:09 p.m. at the "S" curve of the Notch on Route 116.

The bus was traveling south on Route 116 heading towards Mount Holyoke College when the left front end of the bus collided with the left rear of the tractor trailer, according to Sherbin.

"After hitting the truck, the bus headed southbound, continued onto a shoulder and climbed an embankment," Rhodes said.

The Amherst Police Department was assisted at the scene by the Massachusetts State Police Reconstruction Unit to determine what took place leading to the accident.

Traffic was re-routed and remained blocked for about three hours. Late in the afternoon at approximately 4 p.m. officials tried to remove the bus from the road.

Michele Goldberg, director of marketing for the PVTA, said that by the time PVTA officials arrived at the scene, the police were already investigating the accident and Daisley had been transported to the hospital.

Goldberg said the cause of the accident is not yet determined and the PVTA would wait for investigating officers to recreate the scene to determine who may have been responsible.

Rhodes said the accident is under investigation by the Amherst Police Department and the Crews begin search in field for wreckage

By Tony Jewell
Associated Press

ROSELAWN, Ind. — Crews built a gravel road across a boggy soybean field Tuesday to help investigators reach bodies and clues in a commuter plane crash that killed all 68 people on board.

American Eagle Flight 4184 gave off a high-pitched whine of engines at full throttle as it streaked to the ground in a driving rain Monday en route to Chicago's O'Hare Airport.

National Transportation Safety Board spokesman Ted Lopatkiewicz refused to speculate on the cause of the crash. One witness said he saw the almost-new twin-engine propjet plunge toward the ground with a wing sheared off; Lopatkiewicz said he had no comment on that report.

Searchers found the plane's cockpit voice recorder and flight data recorder. Both were sent to Washington for analysis.

The conversation between the cockpit crew and the control tower in Aurora, Ill., didn't indicate anything abnormal, WLS-TV in Chicago reported, citing sources with the NTSB and the Federal Aviation Administration.

On Tuesday, the sun came out after a night of heavy rain, and crews brought in truckloads of gravel to put down a road.

Investigators needed the 200-yard trail to overcome mud too deep even for four-wheel drive vehicles.

The barren field where the plane went down "smelled like a butcher shop," said Les Smith, who lives nearby. Searchers who made it through the muck on foot soon after the crash described small chunks of smashed airplane and pieces of bodies. The largest piece of plane was a 6-to-8-foot section of the tail.

"What we did see, we didn't like," said firefighter John Knapp.

Indiana plane crash claims life of recent UM graduate

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

A 22-year-old University of Massachusetts graduate was among the 68 people killed Monday in the commuter plane crash in Indiana.

Jeff Burrell of Salisbury, Mass., graduated from the University last February with a bachelor's degree in hotel, restaurant and travel administration.

Burrell had been visiting a friend at Indiana State University, according to his father, Gerry Burrell.

"He was a well-liked student who loved life, loved UMass and loved working the club management field," according to a statement from the HRTA Department yesterday afternoon.

The HRTA department is headed by Michael M. Lefever.

American Eagle Flight 4184 crashed Monday afternoon in a soybean field 60 miles short of its destination, Chicago. The cause of the incident has not been determined.

Presently, Burrell is the only known victim of the plane crash from the area.

Burrell worked as a purchasing agent at the Dellwood Country Club in New City, N.Y.

He was one of two children of a Sunday school teacher and a liquor wholesaler. He also leaves an 18-year-old sister.

An avid golfer, Burrell played baseball and basketball at Triton High School, according to principal J. Michael Ward. He graduated in February from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst with a degree in hotel, restaurant and travel administration, school officials said.

Reports from the Associated Press contributed to this story.

Two UM students charged in assaults

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts students were arrested on charges of assault and battery with a knife last weekend in separate incidents.

Both incidents took place in the Southwest Residential Area.

Thomas H. Nickerson Jr., 23, and Robert J. Fox, 19, were both served search warrants and warrants for their arrests in their dorm rooms, according to Karin Sherbin of the UMass News Office.

Police approached both at different times — Nickerson yesterday at 5:22 a.m. in his room in Calvin Coolidge Residence Hall, and Fox Monday at 6:32 a.m. in his room in John Quincy Adams Residence Hall, Sherbin said.

Fox, a second-semester sophomore, allegedly confronted officers with a knife when they approached him with two charges of assault and battery with a knife and one charge of threatening to commit a murder. He was subdued and arrested, Sherbin said.

Nickerson, a junior, was charged in a series of incidents that took place last weekend involving four alleged student victims.

None of the victims received medical treatment, Sherbin said.

His charges include assault with a knife, assault and battery with a knife, assault and battery by means of a shod foot, two counts of assault and battery and malicious injury to state property in relation to damage to doors in Coolidge, Sherbin said.

Nickerson appeared in Northampton District Court today and was released on $5,000 bond. He is scheduled to appear for a pre-trial hearing on Dec. 15, Sherbin said.

Fox, of Rockville Center, N.Y., was charged with one count of assault and battery and threatening to commit a crime Saturday at 3 a.m.

Police were responding to a call concerning a large number of men fighting on the 16th floor of JQA, Sherbin said.

Fox's head was bleeding when the police arrived. He claimed to have been hit in the head with a beer bottle. He was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, where he was treated and released, Sherbin said.

Subsequent investigation led police to charge Fox for reportedly chasing one of his alleged assailants and cutting him with a knife.

Police have no report of the alleged victim receiving medical treatment, Sherbin said.

Fox was arraigned in Northampton District Court Monday and released on personal recognizance.

His pre-trial hearing is scheduled for Dec. 8, Sherbin said.

UMass police are continuing their investigation into who was involved in the assault on Fox, Sherbin said.

Although higher education institutions are not permitted by law to discuss possible disciplinary action against students, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin said, "We take this very seriously. We are concerned about the safety of all our students and will take appropriate action."

Majors Fair helps undergrads plan

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Correspondent

Apparel marketing and wood technology were just two of over 60 majors represented in the Student Union Ballroom (SUB) last night at the first annual University of Massachusetts Majors Fair.

A wood technology graduate receives an average of 2.4 job offers and average starting salary is $26,050, according to Bruce Hoadley, a professor in the Department of Building Materials and Wood Technology.

The Majors Fair was sponsored by the Colleges of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center (CASIAC).

"There were over 100 students waiting at the door even before 7 p.m.," said Samantha Oates, a student who works for CASIAC.

According to Elizabeth Teagan, CASIAC advisor and co- producer of the Majors Fair, approximately 200 students came through the door in the first 10 minutes, and the total number reached about 400.

Student response to the fair was better than expected, she said.

"All the students had positive attitudes, and some representatives from the majors asked if we would have another fair in the spring," Teagan said.

Students entered the colorfully decorated SUB as a flutist played and information about the fair was handed out by CASIAC workers and advisors.

Representatives and peer advisors from 63 majors at UMass were on hand to assist students and offer information.

"Thinking about what you want to do for the rest of your life is not easy. But, the advisors understood and offered ideas," said Yvonne Montemayor. A sophomore at UMass, she spoke with a sports management and a legal studies advisor about becoming a sports lawyer.

Advisors and professors were available to answer any questions students had about majors provided by UMass.

"The advisors were very helpful and easy to understand. I learned a lot about computer programming and software," said freshman Jeffrey Rapaglia.

"I am thinking about changing my political science

Phi Kappa Phi nominating one student for national award

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

Seniors at the University of Massachusetts who display outstanding academic and leadership abilities are eligible for a $7,000 graduate fellowship for first-year graduate or professional study.

The UMass chapter of the Honor Society of Phi Kappa Phi will be reviewing applications and will nominate one University senior to compete at a national level for a full fellowship.

The nominated University student will then compete with nominees from 262 other chapters of Phi Kappa Phi in universities and colleges throughout the nation.

Fifty fellowships will be awarded and 30 additional students will receive honorable mention awards in the amount of $500.

High standardized test scores, transcript records, honors and enrichment programs as well as a one-page essay describing a student's educational and career goals will be essential criteria evaluated by the University Fellowship Committee.

John R. Nelson, chapter president of the honor society, said the essay will be the most important factor with emphasis being placed on a student's creativity and originality.

Seniors from all majors are encouraged to apply for the fellowship. Phi Kappa Phi is the only major national honor society which recognizes academic excellence in all disciplines.

"This award is for graduating seniors only," Nelson said. "You have to be not yet matriculated in graduate school."

Graduating seniors should contact Sylvia Snape at 170 Bartlett Hall, for additional information or to pick up an application.

Deadline for applications is Feb. 1, 1995. Results are to be announced in April, Nelson said.

Over 1,100 students have been recipients of full fellowships and 470 students have received honorable mentions awards since the establishment of the Fellowship Program in 1932.

Dollar hits record low against yen

NEW YORK (AP) — The dollar tumbled to touch an all-time low against the Japanese yen Tuesday and fell against other currencies after a strong economic report reinforced inflation worries, wrenching down stock and bond prices.

The National Association of Purchasing Management's October report showed robust growth in the manufacturing economy and higher prices for raw materials.

Investors dumped U.S. Treasuries and equities for foreign assets, which generated demand for foreign currencies at the expense of the dollar.

Gold prices were lower overseas but ended higher in U.S. dealings.

On the New York Commodities Exchange, gold for current delivery rose 80 cents a troy ounce to $384.30 compared to Monday's close. Republic National Bank said the spot price of gold was $384.50 an ounce as of 4 p.m., up 80 cents from Monday.

The purchasing managers group said its monthly index of economic activity rose sharply to 59.7 percent from 58.2 percent as production reached its highest level since December 1987.

Stocks and bonds fall, despite positive report

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks tumbled with bonds today following the release of data showing a strengthening economy.

The National Association of Purchasing Management October index was 59.7 percent, higher than the 58.1 percent economists had forecast and above September's 58.2 percent.

A reading above 50 percent generally indicates the manufacturing economy is expanding.

A further concern to investors was that the price component of the report showed a significant rise, reflecting growing price pressures in the economy.

"The report spooked investors," said Bill Allyn, managing director at Jefferies & Co.

In another good economic report, the Commerce Department said construction spending surged 1.6 percent in September, the biggest gain in six months.

The 30-year Treasury bond tumbled, lifting the yield back above the benchmark 8 percent level.

Bond investors don't like word of strong growth, which can bring inflation. That erodes the value of fixed-income securities.

Crops rebound after three down days

CHICAGO (AP) — Wheat futures prices rebounded from a six-week low Tuesday on the Chicago Board of Trade as the market consolidated its losses. Corn and soybean futures ended narrowly mixed.

Wheat futures were due for a bounce after falling for three straight days, analysts said.

Some of the buying was rooted in expectations of new export sales.

The Agriculture Department said it was preparing to target Egypt for additional sales of subsidized wheat, and Brazil is believed to be seeking a large allocation of U.S. wheat at subsidized prices.

Wheat for December delivery rose 2 cents to $3.86 1/2 a bushel; December corn ended unchanged at $2.15 3/4 a bushel; December oats rose 1/4 cent to $1.26 a bushel; November soybeans ended unchanged at $5.42 1/4 a bushel.

Hog and pork belly futures fell sharply on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange as large supplies of hogs weighed on the market.

"There's not one body that's intact," said another firefighter, Jerry Cramer.

Gov. Evan Bayh stammered as he described what he saw from a helicopter.

"There is a small crater there and the wreckage is strewn in a fairly close radius around the impact site," he said. "The destruction is complete."

The gymnasium of the North Newton High School, 15 miles from the crash site, was at first designated a morgue and officials planned to cancel classes for at least a week. They later decided to use a National Guard armory as the morgue to avoid disrupting the students' lives.

Officials hadn't begun removing bodies by mid-afternoon. It could take a week to a month to recover all bodies and debris, state police Sgt. Jerry Parker said.

The flight from Indianapolis to Chicago had been in a holding pattern about 60 miles southeast of O'Hare and was descending from 10,000 feet when it crashed.

The French- and Italian-built Super ATR plane was registered in March and had experienced no problems through September, except a broken floor light, according to FAA records.

Bob Hilton, who was working under the hood of his truck at the time of the crash, said the plane sounded like the pilot "had it full throttle, like a stunt pilot, like he was going to try to bring it up."

Conference findings focus on status of women

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Nalini Visvanathan discussed women's reproductive rights last night at Smith College.

AMHERST — In order to head off world crisis, it is necessary to raise the status of women worldwide, according to the findings of a recent U.N. conference.

A panel last night at Smith College discussed the findings of the International Conference on Population and Development, which was held by the United Nations in Cairo, Egypt.

By the year 2050, the world population could grow from 5.5 billion to anywhere between 8 and 14 billion people, said Fred Myerson of Yale University, the first speaker.

He addressed the effects of over population, such as deforestation and the extinction of animals.

"We have a finite amount of resources," Myerson said. "We have to share this with the whole human species and all species."

Myerson also referred to one of the problems in conducting an international conference, that of mistranslation.

When the prospect of expanded condom distribution was brought up, those in the Spanish delegation were given transcripts which said in Spanish that used condoms were to be given out, he said.

According to Myerson, some of the main goals of the conference were to increase family planning, especially in Third World countries where many women don't have access to higher education and birth control.

Karen Kalla, international population director for the Sierra Club, was the second speaker. She used Cairo as an example of what the conference was trying to accomplish.

She discussed female genital mutilation and how, although illegal, it is still practiced by some mid-wives. This is significant since, according to Kalla, 50 to 60 percent of all births take place in the home.

Kalla said health clinics in Cairo are attempting to educate mid-wives on proper techniques of child birth and to initiate health education in the school system.

She also spoke of the high rate of maternal deaths during childbirth. According to Kalla, there are 176 maternal deaths per every 100,000 live births in Cairo, compared to 8 per every 100,000 in this country.

"I came away from Cairo with a profoundly deep commitment and urgency," she said.

Kalla said foreign aid should be a national priority to help provide such basic human services in the Third World as clean water, sanitation and education, especially for women.

"Secondly, we need to look at how we're living in the United States," she said.

Nalini Visvanathan of the School for International Training described the conference as "a landmark for women" and "a recognition of their reproductive rights."

"In no other U.N. document has womens' rights been so clearly explained," said Visvanathan.

She said consumption of natural resources did not get the attention it deserved.

"Reproductive rights mean nothing to a woman who doesn't know where her next meal is coming from," Visvanathan said.

Someone from the audience questioned the optimism surrounding the conference.

"Every journey begins with a single step," said Myerson. "This conference is a step and the best form we have now in the world."

Puerto Rico: Still traveling on the road towards freedom

By Hernan Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

Yesterday the University was offered an emotional session on what has been a struggle for independence in the island of Puerto Rico. The conference, titled "Colonialism: The Struggle for Justice in Puerto Rico," was presented by two panelists, Rafael Cancel Miranda and Ronald Fernandez.

The event was co-sponsored by the New World Theater, the Latin American Cultural Center, AHORA and the Office of Third World Affairs. Nelson Acosta, president of OTWA, opened the conference and introduced the panelists.

Miranda, a native Puerto Rican, has been a nationalist fighter for over 40 years; Fernandez, of Spanish descent, is a professor and current director of the Center for Caribbean Studies at Central Connecticut State University. They each provided their personal insight on the Puerto Rican freedom struggle, providing the audience with contrasting yet juxtaposing theoretical and practical perspectives.

Fernandez focused on a historico-political analysis of the struggle, starting with the United States' annexation of the island by invasion in 1898. Because of political and military strategies, Puerto Rico became "the first unincorporated territory to the United States," he said.

This was due to the fact that the island was to be treated as a colonial holding and no more than that; this has been the U.S. attitude from President Theodore Roosevelt stead- fastly to President Bush, said Fernandez, adding that this has led to "an incredible arrogance and an absence of knowledge" about the island and its people.

Insisting on this creation of misconceptions and misinfor- mation from the U.S. perspective, the Puerto Ricans witnessed a system of imposed colonization which coerced them to change their mode of thinking, their way of acting, and even their feeling of belonging to a land of their own, he said.

As Fernandez pointed out, this was implemented from changing the name of the island to "Porto Rico" to enforcing U.S. citizenship upon its people in 1917 and declaring the colony an official Commonwealth holding in 1950. This gave rise to the call for nationalism that gradually developed into guerilla military warfare against the invading forces.

Rafael Cancel Miranda joined in at this point, speaking in Spanish at the overwhelming request of the audience. Speaking with emotion about his personal experience, Miranda impressed the listeners with a deeply palpable expression of physical experience that drew the audience into engaging in discussion. He had not accepted the ruling colonizer regime, and at the early age of 23 was sent to jail for avoiding the U.S. military draft.

"They have been strangling us because they can't deal with our dignity," Miranda said. He intertwined what Fernandez had discussed with the way he had actually lived the events.

Miranda made it a point to inform the audience of what the U.S. domination of the land had done to the people and the culture: "there's nothing sweeter than knowing oneself," he said. He also enlightened the attendees with examples where he proved that "rights have to be taken, and not asked for," in making the nationalist revolution.

From both academic and practical views, the audience could infer the underlying element; all sides embraced what Fernandez named the "Puerto Rican family" and Miranda said was "my people, my family" as a way of exemplifying the unison and cohesion of an oppressed people, and that the struggle is not over, and it must go on.

Program ready to celebrate ten years of help

By Kathryn Silver
Collegian Correspondent

This Thursday the Hampshire County Women, Infants and Children (WIC) program will be hosting an open house to celebrate its ten-year anniversary.

WIC is a special supplemental food program for women, infants and children. The program works to provide food for pregnant women and mothers of young children who cannot afford to buy the foods necessary for healthy development.

"The program is basically here to serve as a prevention method to avoid malnutrition," said Joy Nolan, community coordinator for the Hampshire County WIC office.

Food vouchers are provided to those families who fall within a moderate income guideline, Nolan said.

"Income guidelines are much higher than many social services," Nolan said. "Even two-income houses can be on WIC if they are not making ends meet."

WIC participants are provided with services that include personalized food vouchers and nutritional counseling, Nolan said.

"Each case is evaluated and vouchers are made out for certain foods. These vouchers are then used like travelers checks," she said.

WIC is funded through the USDA and is a nation-wide organization. "It is an entitlement program, which means that everyone who falls within the income guidelines is guaranteed help," Nolan said.

The Massachusetts Child Hunger Release Act of 1993 increased state funding, making Massachusetts one of the only states to fully fund the WIC program, Nolan said.

"For every dollar spent on WIC, $4.20 is saved on Medicaid. This was a major factor in the funding increase," she said.

Applying for WIC assistance requires minimal paperwork, Nolan said.

"People looking for help simply need to bring something with an address on it, income information and they need to get an iron test. United States citizenship is not required. We also have a presumption of pregnancy policy that allows a woman up to 60 days to produce a pregnancy test," she said.

According to Nolan WIC is seeking participants. There is no waiting list.

"Unfortunately, many people do not think they are eligible for help, so they don't even bother to come down to our office. The income guidelines are higher than people might think, so even those families just pulling it together to pay the bills can usually get WIC aid," she said.

The open house will be held from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. at the Hampshire County office. Information will be provided to those seeking help as well as people looking to volunteer, Nolan said.

Guest speakers will include Mary Ford, mayor of Northampton and state Rep. Ellen Story.

The featured speaker will be Cindy Dugan, a registered nurse and breast feeding expert. Dugan "will lecture on the merits of breast feeding, promoting it as the healthiest infant feeding option and refuting recent negative press on breast feeding," Nolan said.

To find out more about the open house or volunteer opportunities, contact the WIC office at 584-3591.

Opinion/Editorial

Vote Yes on Question 3

Opponents of Question 3 argue that the state is trying to cripple students' ability to influence legislation. According to lobbying groups like MASSPIRG, a "yes" vote will virtually eliminate their funding and disempower students.

The No on 3 campaign is misrepresenting the issue. They want to continue the "negative check-off" money for MASSPIRG is automatically added to your bill unless students or their parents take action to waive it.

Voting yes on 3 eliminates this waivable fee. MASSPIRG argues that it bans students from giving money to groups reforming state laws. This isn't true: They can still collect money through students' bills, but only through an optional fee — meaning bill payers must check that yes, they do support MASSPIRG.

It's a subtle difference, but an important one: A waivable fee assumes all students support a lobbying group unless they specify otherwise, and an optional fee places the choice more directly in the hands of the bill payer.

The optional fee places the burden on MASSPIRG to solicit contributions rather than assuming support from the entire student body. It's a significant distinction, and the aggressiveness of the No on 3 campaign shows that the consequences for MASSPIRG could be drastic. But the blame doesn't rest with the state; it is the responsibility of the lobbying groups to convince students that their interests are being served.

Voting yes on Question 3 empowers students, providing them a more straightforward tuition bill that doesn't try to sneak anything through.

Two crucial votes for health care

As election day nears, the major issues raised by campaigning politicians across the nation continue to be crime policy, immigration laws and welfare reform. Fortunately for Massachusetts, the high-profile senatorial contest between incumbent Ted Kennedy and Republican challenger Mitt Romney has been forced to address the complex issue of health care.

While 1994's congressional and senatorial sessions were driving this year's health care legislation into the ground, a publication from the Center on Budget and Public Policy reported that 39.7 million Americans were uninsured in 1993, up nine million from 1987. Through all the political rhetoric and inaction of the past two years, there remains a large segment of the American population that does not have access to basic health care.

Thomas Akyali

Under our existing health care system, the upper and middle classes are insured by their employers. Lower class welfare recipients also have access to services through Medicare programs. As the recent debates between Kennedy and Romney have pointed out, it is the multitude of lower- middle class part-time workers who are falling through the cracks of our existing health care system. Laborers who hold two or more part-time jobs may well work over 40 hours per week and remain uninsured, as neither of their employers are required to provide health insurance. The plight of these workers illuminates the pressing need for a universal health care program under which all Americans will be covered regardless of pre-existing conditions or employment status.

Such universal coverage is part of Sen. Kennedy's health care reform program. He proposes to require employer contributions to health care with an exemption for small businesses. The most appealing aspect of this plan is that part-time workers and those who are independently employed will receive coverage, as will those who are unemployed.

Detractors of Kennedy's plan point out that if employers are forced to insure their part-time workers, they will respond by cutting their labor forces. The solution to this accurate assessment is a pro-rated health care contribution based on the number of hours an employee works at each job. Thus a worker who divides his 40 hours between two jobs will have his insurance costs split proportionately by his employers.

In his stance on health care reform, the Republican Romney has proposed incentives, not mandates, in order to secure employer contributions to health insurance. He also proposes to make health care more competitive by providing consumer information and reforming malpractice laws.

Ultimately, however, these policies are influenced by the interests of the insurance and medical industries, neither of which are eager to lose the financial bonanza our present system provides for them. Romney insists that such reforms focus on maintaining the high quality of both our health care personnel and technology. Unfortunately, having the world's best doctors and most advanced procedures means nothing if our populace cannot afford them.

On this year's ballot there is a non-binding referendum, Question 10, which asks if elected officials from Massachusetts should be authorized to vote in favor of legislation providing universal health care coverage. By giving our representatives this mandate and by supporting Kennedy's program, we can provide momentum to the battle for health care for all Americans.

Our elected officials are constantly barraged by lobbyists working on behalf of the insurance and medical industries. While executives and doctors are entitled to competitive salaries, the right of our hard-working citizenry to affordable medicine supersedes all capitalist considerations. In the world's greatest nation, nobody should be denied basic health care. A vote for Kennedy, combined with a yes vote on Question 10, will eliminate any doubt as to what the people of Massachusetts expect in health care.

Just one more trivia question

When I think about my high school, I have much to feel proud of. In addition to offering what I believe is a very high quality public education, Cambridge Rindge & Latin School is the answer to more than one trivia question worthy of mention.

Among these: Name the only U.S. high school with two graduates who have become National Basketball Association lottery draft picks (Patrick Ewing and Rumeal Robinson); name the only U.S. high school to have two of its graduates medal in the 1992 Summer Olympics (Ewing and women's basketballer Medina Dixon); name the first public school in Massachusetts to dispense condoms to students (in 1990).

Derek Milosavljevic

No doubt you're suitably impressed at this point, but the folks in Newtowne are never ones to rest on their laurels.

It seemed likely going into last night's school committee vote that Cambridge will become the first in the state to distribute long-term contraceptives including birth control pills.

Four of the city's seven school committee members expressed their support publicly last week for a proposal, submitted by the Cambridge Health Policy Board.

The proposal does not specify exactly which contraceptives would be offered at the Teen Health Center, the clinic at the high school, but the Boston Globe has reported that among the choices offered may be Depo Provera, an injection that provides three months of birth control, and Norplant, an implant inserted under the skin that works for five years.

Oh, how I long for the days when only the basketball and track teams for my school made the Globe.

While I applaud the efforts of those students who took it upon themselves to distribute AIDS education pamphlets and condoms to students in 1990, leading to the current availability of condoms at the clinic, this time the city is going too far.

With the current policy, teenagers are showing responsibility in going to the clinic and getting contraceptives; the new proposal would have just the opposite effect.

Learned Cambridge school committee member E. Denise Williams, a mother of three unfortunate daughters, said, "I know how these young ladies feel, and it's hard for them to talk about issues of sexuality."

Presumably Ms. Williams means that these girls have trouble telling their sex partners to use a condom. All those communications problems will be a thing of the past if the proposal passes, freeing up young CRLS women to have a ball, so to speak, without ever having talk to their partner.

The last thing any 17-year-old girl needs is a five-year implant preventing her from squeezing out a kid. The first thing she needs is to be woman enough to talk to her boyfriend about safe sex, or to keep her pants on.

Protecting women from thinking

Roy McMillan is a God-fearing Christian who believes abortion is wrong. Living in Jackson, Miss., McMillan has made his anti-abortion belief his full-time job.

E.C. Thomas

From nine to five, McMillan stands outside the local abortion clinic and protests. I can respect that. That someone believes so strongly in something that they devote their entire lives to it strikes me as somewhat passionate. No matter what I may think of their opinion, I can respect that they have it. So when I began reading about Roy McMillan, I respected him.

But as I read on, the respect soon faded and a feeling of disgust swept over me. McMillan's exercise of his freedom of speech goes beyond the First Amendment right to protest. Shouting and waving signs to express your opinion is one thing — advocating the killing of doctors who perform abortions, accosting women entering the Jackson clinic, taking the men accompanying them aside to scold them for not handling their women correctly and in general trying to gain control over women's lives is quite another.

What really angers me about Roy McMillan is not that he is anti-abortion, but that he is hiding behind this grand facade of "I am protector of women." He often describes his work as motivated by respect for women, who he believes are risking their physical and emotional health by having an abortion. However, McMillan's behavior is anything but respectful; in fact, it is down right degrading.

Not only does McMillan accost women at the clinic but in his self-righteous frenzy he also pulls aside the men accompanying them. McMillan's main theme, apart from abortion being religiously wrong, is men protecting their families and women listening to their men.

He proudly describes a scene where a couple arrived at the clinic and he shouted at the man, "Sir, be a real man and protect your child."

"Ain't nothing I can do about it," the man responded.

"Then you ought to change underwear with her. She ought to have the boxer shorts and you ought to have the pink lace panties." A few minutes later the men emerged from the clinic to talk to McMillan.

"Sir, you're 220 pounds, you can handle her," McMillan said. The man went back into the clinic, grabbed the woman by the arm, dragged her outside, put her in the car and drove away.

Even the women McMillan has convinced have unsettling things to say about him. One woman whose two children were in foster care and was in the middle of getting a divorce had hitchhiked to Jackson to obtain an abortion. After learning of her intentions, one of her rides took her to see McMillan. Although he never outrightly convinced her that she was wrong, McMillan delayed the woman's intentions for so long she could no longer consider the option. Once the baby was born the McMillans gave her money and a temporary place to live and helped her get her other children back.

But despite McMillan's noble effort to help this woman, she says today, "I just don't like him. He tells everyone how to live their lives and sometimes it isn't the right way for them." Recently this woman lost all three of her children to foster care.

Other women McMillan has helped agree. "He's a lech, hundred percent," said one. She and other women describe times when McMillan has touched them or made them feel uncomfortable. This attitude becomes apparent in not only his treatment to the women seeking abortions, but other as well. During his interview with the New York Times he said, "Pro-abortionists say it isn't a person, it's just a glob of cells. Well, we all began as a glob of cells." Pausing, he looked over his female interviewer and continued, "And I really like the way your globs have developed."

McMillan's attitude is further evident in his relationship with his wife, an ob/gyn doctor. Dr. Beverly McMillan used to perform abortions; now she is firmly against them. Her abortion beliefs didn't change once she met Roy McMillan, but during the early years of her marriage the way she practiced medicine and her attitudes toward other women did. On her husband's bidding, she will no longer prescribe any type of birth control or perform sterilization for women, married or unmarried. But Dr. McMillan's practice goes beyond just medicine. One patient recalls being told, "Stay with your man, even if he cheats on you, even if he abuses you."

What this all comes down to is control. Roy McMillan's intentions go far beyond controlling whether or not a woman may have an abortion as a legal option; they also encompass a desire to control women's lives in general. For McMillan to claim that his protest has been waged out of his respect for women and in order to protect them is an outright lie.

The fact that women may presently obtain an abortion isn't what threatens people like Roy McMillan; it is the fact that women have been granted the right to control their own lives by making their own decisions. Roy McMillan can't accept the concept that women have established a persona all their own, one that is not the property of their male partners — and certainly not that of Roy McMillan's.

One only has to look at the woman who has now lost all three of her children to foster care and wonder whether or not she was right after all.

Hemp legalization aids cancer patients

To the editor:

In my junior year of college my mother died after years of battling the effects of cancer. I still burn now to describe the experience. Many people have never seen what life is like for someone undergoing chemotherapy and radiology treatments; knowing the medicine is a last- ditch effort is a devastating emotional blow, but the physical trauma is the worst part.

During her treatment, my mother spent most of her days hunched over, throwing up. She lost weight and became weaker, unable to enjoy a meal with her family. Frequently reduced to tears and constantly seeking relief from pain, my mother spent the last days of her life in agony.

The Drug Enforcement Administration insists that marijuana has no medical value. I don't buy it. There are too many people using it to treat their nausea, spasms and pain, people who swear no other medicine works for them. While the DEA refuses to give permission to use marijuana even to the terminally ill police are still arresting sick people.

Whether marijuana is dangerous or not is not the issue — chemotherapy is undoubtedly dangerous, and it is legal. So were the cigarettes that gave my mother cancer in the first place.

The simple fact is that hundreds of thousands of very sick people would be better off if it weren't for the DEA. As a marijuana legalization activist, I have read more than my share of stories which highlight the cruelty of the DEA — paraplegics thrown in jail without access to health care, AIDS patients dying while they await trial in a cell, epilepsy and multiple sclerosis sufferers who end up in the hospital after a police officer takes their marijuana away. There is no good reaso to keep this medicine illegal.

This Thursday UMass will hear the testimony of medical patients who have used marijuana. There will be a rally by the Cannabis Action Network, sponsored by UMACRC, at noon on the Student Union steps.

Parking system keeps UMass sane

To the editor:

I, like many before me, would like to discuss the parking system here at UMass. Recently, people have knocked it quite a bit. They base their criticisms on the fact that they get parking tickets when they rebel against the system. I, myself, have felt this frustration but feel that the system, as terrible as it may seem, ultimately saves the sanity of our UMass community.

Last year I lived in Johnson in Northeast. I was about to leave UMass to go home and needed to load some heavy stuff into my car. So I put on my hazards and parked outside the dorm. From the outside, that might not seem like a terrible crime. But at UMass, it's breakin' the law.

I began making the three trips into and out of my living space. On the second trip, I came out to find a woman opening her ticket book. I said, "Oh wait, I'll move it as soon as I get this stuff in my car." She closed her book and began to tell me where the tow zones were around my building. Out of the corner of my eye I saw another parking officer facing my car and starting to write a ticket. We looked at her with a "what are you doing" stare. Sheralized that the situation was under control and she could continue her hunt elsewhere.

Imagine being a commuter student and driving in the snow to school only to find that the only place to park is by Southwest. Not only do you miss your class, but you freeze solid somewhere around Boyden. Imagine working for the University in the Student Union every day having to park in E-lot up by the career center. Imagine further, walking past the dusty Dodge Dart parked outside the Campus Center by a student who doesn't even go to this school anymore. This is UMass without a parking enforcement system.

Irish, French team up for Bowker performance

COURTESY LA BOTTINE SOURIANTE

La Bottine Souriante

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

What would happen when you mix Quebecois folk music with a lilting Irish jig? How about a Franco-Irish musical summit? Quebec's folk orchestra, La Bottine Souriante will perform with the super-group of Irish traditional music, Patrick Street, tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

Both Ireland and Quebec have many things in common. Both claim a rich musical tradition based around step dancing. Both favor fiddles and accordions and both have no love for the English. They also represent the two largest ethnic groups in New England. La Bottine Souriante and Patrick Street will collaborate in a unique concert to demonstrate the affinities between these two melodic cultures.

La Bottine Souriante (the smiling boot) is one of the most popular groups in French Canada. Founded in 1976, they have since recorded seven albums and toured extensively throughout the United States, Europe and Canada. The group blends the sounds from the piano, double bass, harmonica, fiddle, foot and mandolin augmented in performance by a quartet of jazz brass players who perform in a freewheeling style wedded to the drive of the Quebecois reel.

Patrick Street was formed in 1986. The quartet includes a fiddle, guitar and accordion. One of the most dynamic ensembles in Irish music, the group offers carefully crafted renditions of the Quebecois/Irish intersection, impeccably performed by top-notch musicians who understand the culture as well as the music.

The concert will feature both solo and joined performances in a variety of new configurations sure to please everyone.

Tickets are $20 and $15 with half price tickets for Five College students. Tickets for children age 16 and under are $8. For more information call 545-2511.

Ska faves Bim Skala Bim to play Pearl St.

By Dave Jostrow
Collegian Correspondent

There are a few bands out there who still have not been exploited or overexposed. These bands play music the way it is meant to be played, stripped down to its true essence.

One band that offers such an escape is Bim Skala Bim, veterans of the Massachusetts ska scene since 1985. On Thursday night they will once again take the stage at Pearl Street with their refreshing blend of music, which has some reggae and calypso mixed in with an unmistakable rhythmic sound.

Bim Skala Bim knows how to capture an audience, and an evening with the band quickly becomes addictive and satisfying. They continuously tour the country and their experience is sure to reveal itself whenever they perform live.

The band has played with internationally known acts including Fishbone, Ziggy Marley and The Skatalites. They were voted as the best local reggae/ska act in a poll conducted by the Boston Phoenix five years in a row from 1988 to 1992.

Dan Vitale handles the vocals with guitar player Jim Jones occasionally taking the microphone in addition to skillfully tackling the guitar. Vitale's presence is inconspicuously cool, while Vinny Nobile extends his trombone deep into the crowd. They usually respond by affectionately rubbing his bald head.

The best reason to see Bim Skala Bim is for the genuine pleasure they exhibit each time they perform. They never fail to return to Northampton, unlike so many other bands who seem to forget the Pioneer Valley as soon as they discover national fame. Bim Skala Bim's loyalty has resulted in a following that seems to grow larger every year.

The music of Bim Skala Bim covers a wide spectrum, with topics ranging from love to junk mail. They also add some spice to rock classics when they perform live, traditionally "ska-modifying" songs like "Sunshine of Your Love" and "Dark Side of the Moon."

As one person said at a Bim Skala Bim show last year, "There's just so much positive energy in here."

To truly understand the band and the entire genre of ska, it is necessary to experience Bim on stage with a tightly-packed crowd of happy young people bouncing around.

Bim Skala Bim will play at Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton on Nov. 3. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. The show is 18+.

Injury a treatable spin-off of exercise

By Peg Mitchel
Collegian Correspondent

Now more than ever, many college students are involved in aerobic activities such as jogging and aerobic dance. Whether for competition, health or just plain old fun, activities such as these provide numerous cardiovascular benefits.

But as in any other sport there lies the potential for injury. Many of us end up limping off the field not long after we've begun. Just as we begin to reap the benefits of exercise some kind of bothersome pain sets in. What's going on?

Very commonly, individuals who participate in sports that involve running and jumping can develop an overuse injury along the lower leg, says Dr. Daniel S. Fick of the University of Iowa Hospitals. Most people recognize this pain as "shin splints," a catch-all phrase used to describe pain felt midway down the front of the lower leg. It usually develops gradually with exercise and subsides with rest.

However, the term that more accurately defines the injury, according to the American Medical Association, is medial tibial stress syndrome (MTSS). This syndrome encompasses pain of the soft tissues and should not be confused with tibial stress fractures or compartment syndrome, states the April 1994 issue of The Physician and Sports Medicine.

Usually the culprit behind MTSS is overuse, says Dr. William S. Case, director of physical therapy with Rehabilitation Services of Houston. Overuse can result from out-of-shape muscles, worn-out shoes, too much running or jumping, hard terrain and lack of flexibility. Running injuries are understandable considering that with each stride, the runner's leg absorbs two to three times his or her weight. The overall impact of this repetitive jumping and/or running, rather than a single traumatic event, will generally cause this type of overuse injury to occur.

What can be done? Here are a few suggestions from Dr. Case:

Besides ice and rest, sufferers should check their feet for blisters, ingrown toenails, planters warts and calluses. Such minor afflictions often cause people to shift their weight to avoid friction on these areas. Are your ankles rolling in or out? Are you gripping your toes in your shoes?

Secondly, make sure you have the proper footwear. For runners, alternate between two pairs of shoes, check for unusual wear patterns, and make sure they are not too worn out. Shoes should provide stability, cushioning and enough flexibility. Avoid wearing a tennis shoe for aerobic dance because this type of shoe lacks pliability.

Dr. Case suggests that if the pain does not subside in a few days with ice and rest alone, then stop the pain-producing activity. Switching activities to non-impact exercises such as swimming and cycling allow time for the injury to heal while providing ongoing aerobic benefits.

Here is an at-home rehabilitation treatment Dr. Case recommends:

On days 1 through 3 of treatment, rub ice on the area for 15 minutes twice a day. (A helpful hint for your cold fingers: freeze water in paper cups and peel back an inch or so of the cup to uncover the ice.)

On days 3 through 10, apply moist heat in the form of a bath, shower or moist heating pad for 15 minutes once or twice a day. In addition, gently massage the area before stretching and strengthening exercises. These may include calf raises and lower leg stretches. See your medical practioner for proper techniques of these exercises.

On days 10 through 14 gradually return to light running or half your pre-injury workout level. Avoid hard terrain such as asphalt.

If pain continues, stop exercising and consult a doctor familiar with overuse injuries, says Dr. Case. He or she may recommend other treatments such as shoe inserts or anti- inflammatory medications.

Beausoleil delights crowd with cajun style

BEAUSOLEIL
Pearl Street
Oct. 31

Considered by many music critics to be one of America's finest live acts, the Cajun band Beausoleil crawled from the swamps of Louisiana and into Pearl Street for a special Halloween show.

The crowd turnout was small, especially for a band of Beausoleil's stature. With songs such as "Parlez-Nous a Boire" ("Speak To Us Of Drinking") and "Flammes D' Enfer" ("The Flames Of Hell") in their repertoire, Beausoleil seemed to be perfect hosts for a carnival ball.

The band unassumingly took the stage, six members strong — squeezebox, metal frotoir (washboard), guitar, drums, bass — and sounded tight and spirited, displaying some of the finest ensemble work I have heard yet. Singer/fiddle player Michael Doucet emerged as the ringmaster of the scorching Cajun onslaught.

Mark Dendy's 'Ride to Heaven' not a drag

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

If you liked the Crying Game and were amused by Heart and Souls, then go see Dendy Dance and Performance in "Bus Ride to Heaven," the Residential Arts Off-Center series kick-off play on Nov. 3 at 8 p.m. at the Hampden Theater.

Dendy's "Bus Ride to Heaven" tells the story of three completely different characters who die on the same day and find themselves filling out questionnaires before boarding a bus bound for the pearly gates.

A 70-year-old murderess, a transvestite hooker, a person with AIDS, a television evangelist and her chain smoking, Enquirer-reading follower all die on the same day and end up together to share their stories, explore their emotions, and re-examine their lives.

It is the final question, "What is the meaning of life?" which stumps them all and makes them question where they have been and who they are. The play also asks these questions of the viewers. The performance will give testimony to Dendy's gifts as a writer and an actor.

Dendy received his bachelor of fine arts degree from North Carolina School of the Arts in 1983, continuing his studies as a Young Artist Scholar at the American Dance Festival. He founded Dendy Dance and Performance in 1983 and has been presenting home sessions in NYC and touring the United States, Europe and the Middle East to critical acclaim since the company's inception. He premiered his "one-woman" show "Bus Ride to Heaven" in HOT the QUEER CULTURE Festival at Performance Space 122 in August.

Tickets for the show are $10 general and $5 for Five College students. For more information call the Fine Arts Center Box office at 545-2511. Residential Arts is sponsored in part by the University Arts Council and the Student Affair Cultural Enrichment Fund.

'Mad About You' tries to capture couple–hood

By Niki Kapsombelis
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Ask anyone who works on "Mad About You" where they get their ideas and nobody will admit they're secretly taping the conversations of millions of married couples.

But that's exactly what most of their studio audience believes. They've forfeited a Friday night to come to a taping of their lives — or, more accurately, the lives of Paul and Jamie Buchman, the Everycouple from New York who are the focus of the NBC sitcom. The woman warming up the audience asks how many people think the show is about them. A wave of hands shoots into the air.

A couple once got engaged at a "Mad About You" taping; maybe they succumbed to the pervasive sense of couplehood that abounds here.

Paul Reiser is dodging in and out of the crew's way, sipping Evian and shaking hands, while the theme song he wrote plays for the crowd. Helen Hunt is reading lines, keeping largely to herself while a hairdresser flits about. Reiser's real-life wife, Paula, is chatting on the sidelines.

But once the cameras roll, something bizarre happens — Reiser and Hunt are echoing fights, reconciliations and conversations you and your spouse probably had last night, or last year.

"We wanted it to feel more like life than it did television," says Reiser, the star, co-creator and co-producer. "People come in a little deeper with you, because they relate to you more. So it's very much what we hoped to do, and it's gratifying when it happens."

"Mad About You," which airs at 8 p.m. EDT Thursdays, has started out its third season in impressive fashion: it nearly cracked the Nielsen top 10 in recent ratings, coming in 12th. Last year, it hovered around No. 30 among prime-time shows.

The series' art-imitates-life style frequently has been compared to that of another, even more successful NBC Thursday comedy, "Seinfeld" — something "Mad's" makers accept with equanimity.

"The first wave is comparisons. The second wave is questions about the comparisons," says Reiser. "It's not really an issue."

Executive producer Danny Jacobson, who co-created "Mad About You" with Reiser, isn't complaining either.

"I love being mentioned in the same breath as 'Seinfeld,' " he says, adding that such comparisons mean "there's people out there doing good stuff on TV."

It seems no detail is negligible when it comes to creating a sense of realism. One set decorator decided to replace the bag of dog food sitting in a kitchen corner because he thought the Buchmans would feed their beloved mutt, Murray, a better brand. And the actors and writers are devoted to duplicating the cadence of everyday speech.

As Hunt's Jamie makes dinner, Reiser moves in and out of the kitchen, talking to her, interrupting, absent-mindedly changing the subject.

At times, he talks around the business card he's using to pick at something caught in his teeth. She works a screaming tirade around the theatrically perilous job of tearing off cheap pantyhose.

"In real life, you never stand in the middle of the room and talk to each other. Ever. You shout from another room, you're busy doing something and you cut each other off," Reiser says.

Robert Evans tells all about his H'wood days

By George Hackett
Associated Press

In the preface to his "tell-it-all" autobiography, movie mogul Robert Evans writes that there are three sides to every story: "yours. . . mine. . and the truth."

At times, he seems to be inflating the truth in The Kid Stays in the Picture (Hyperion, $24.95). But it still rates four stars for lifting the curtain on his Hollywood days, his marriage to four women, including Ali MacGraw and Phyllis George, and his films, notably Love Story and The Godfather.

Evans was a successful radio actor at age 11 in his native New York. He then graduated to the theater and by age 20 was under contract to Paramount.

Dropped from the studio's roster, he joined his brother, Charles, and Joseph Picone in manufacturing women's clothing. The company, Evan-Picone, was later sold for $12 million cash.

Hollywood beckoned again in 1956 when Darryl Zanuck offered him a role opposite Ava Gardner in The Sun Also Rises. Gardner, Tyrone Power and other cast members protested in a cable to Zanuck that the picture would be a disaster if Evans played the bullfighter.

Zanuck appeared on the set, bullhorn in hand, and announced: "The kid stays in the picture. And anybody who doesn't like it can quit!"

Evans' career took off in a new direction after Charles Bluhdorn, the chairman of Gulf & Western, acquired Paramount, then on the verge of bankruptcy, and made him production chief.

Evans discovered that he had taken a lover, a mistress. "I was obsessed with her: the Paramount mountain. It was a seven-day-a-week, 18-hour-a-day affair. It got worse. From obsessed, I became possessed.

I doubt whether there was one night a week for three years that I left the studio before midnight. I couldn't help it. I didn't want to fail."

He didn't. Under his guidance, Paramount produced at least a dozen hits, among them The Odd Couple and Rosemary's Baby.

Canadian productions boosting exports for television in the States

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — VIEWER ADVISORY: Some television programming may inspire an odd, mildly pleasant urge to hum a few bars of "O Canada."

Hollywood has long made use of Canadian scenery and actors. But now the north-of-the-border entertainment industry is selling an increasing amount of TV movies and series to eager U.S. networks.

Canada's biggest film and TV producer-distributor, Alliance Communications, celebrated a landmark this season: its "Due South" became the first Canadian-made prime-time series on a major U.S. network.

So far, it's a winner: CBS ordered a full season, 22 episodes, of the comic action series, airing at 8 p.m. EDT Thursdays, featuring a do-right Canadian Mountie and his odd-couple partner, a scruffy Chicago cop.

"They deliver a first-rate show," said Steve Warner, CBS' senior vice president for program planning. "The only difference is it takes longer to get the dailies through customs."

Alliance also created lustier fare for CBS in the form of four Harlequin romance novel-based TV movies, and has about 15 movies and series in development or production for U.S. cable and broadcast outlets, said Michael Weisbarth, executive vice president, Alliance Entertainment USA.

Canadians note that they've been making deals with broadcasters here for a decade, with the volume and visibility of projects growing steadily.

"It's one of those overnight success stories that's years in the making," said Steven DeNure, president of Alliance productions.

A major shift occurred about five years ago, Weisbarth says: After watching Americans film in Canada, and after becoming partners in some of those projects, Canadian producers decided to sell directly to U.S. networks.

they're in French," the fiddle maestro told the crowd and an intimacy swiftly grew between Beausoleil and the frothing multitude. Doucet's voice swooped and swirled as much as his fiddle playing; he ranged from plaintive longing to wild abandon. He also plugged the audience into the rich French Acadian history of southwestern Louisiana's Cajun masters like the Balfa Brothers or Hector Duhon.

Despite my five years of French language in my youth,– I couldn't understand a damn thing. But this was life music, after all, and the audience understood it just fine.

The dance floor was crammed with expert Cajun waltzers strutting their stuff to Jimmy Breaux's pumping accordion and the rock solid drumming of Tommy Alesi. From the song "Le Jig Francais" on, Pearl Street seemed like another planet, with dancers moving in perfect precision.

And at the end of the evening? Beausoleil had triumphed mightily with their hard-earned brand of cool. One costumed couple — –an angel and a devil — hung on each other deliriously, and it's likely that Doucet and the boys would have had the night no other way.

My eyes teared as I hacked my desert dry cough at the road dust that swirled up from behind the passing semi. Yes, I was lost... a long way from the rotting New York cul-de-sac I had called my home. Why HAD I eaten that moldy bread. Why DID I let that circus bear break my heart.

Greg Cannella recommended for UMass men's lacrosse job

"We're very fortunate to have Greg. He's an outstanding young man, and he'll do a great job for the team."
– Associate Athletic Director Bob Pickett

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

A search committee has recommended that the administration hire Greg Cannella as head coach of the men's lacrosse team.

Cannella, who became the interim head coach after Ted Garber left the men's lax team for an athletic director/coaching job at Avon Old Farms Preparatory School on Aug. 12, has to be approved by Chancellor David Scott and the Affirmative Action Committee before being given the full-time post.

Cannella declined to comment until the final decisions is made.

The 1988 Massachusetts graduate was an assistant coach under Garber for the past two seasons. Cannella spent the previous four seasons, from 1988 to 1992, at the State University of New York at Stony Brook, serving his tenure as the team's offensive and recruiting coordinator.

The Amherst, native also served as an instructor in the Department of Physical Education and Athletics and earned his master of arts degree in liberal studies while at Stony Brook.

In his playing days at Massachusetts, Cannella was a starter for the Minutemen in 1986 and 1987, when they participated in the NCAA Tournament under the coaching of legendary coach Dick Garber.

"We're very fortunate to have Greg," said Associate Athletic Director Bob Pickett. "He came through the program. He's an outstanding young man, and he'll do a great job for the team.

"He has handled the interim job with great maturity."

Sources said that other coaches interviewed for the position included Duke's Mike Pressler, Kevin Corrigan of Notre Dame, Loyola's Dave Cotto, Hobart's B.J. O'Hara and Jim Burkman, coach of the Division III champion Salisbury State.

"I don't know Greg all that well, but from what I know of him, he is very knowledgeable of the game, and he is very personable," Corrigan said.

According to Pickett, the search committee consisted of Assistant Athletic Director/Media Relations Director Bill Strickland, Associate Athletic Director Al Rufe and alumnus Norm Smith.

With the naming of Cannella as interim coach came the inevitable change as Massachusetts prepares for the first season in the school's history without a Garber on the sidelines.

The elder Garber won 300 games in his 36 seasons, while Garber compiled a four-year mark of 37–17 and made the NCAA Tournament twice, in 1991 and 1993.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Greg Cannella was the search committee's choice to become the next head coach of Massachusetts men's lacrosse.

When Ted Garber took the Avon Old Farms job back in August, he said his former assistant would be the ideal replacement for Massachusetts.

"They should name Greg head coach," Garber said. "I [had] gotten a lot of positive comments from people and Greg had a lot to do with it. He's a great recruiter and he works his tail off.

"He's a loyal, dedicated and hard–working alumnus. And he's knowledgeable. I was fortunate to have him as an assistant. When he came in, we won the NE Championship and he had a lot to do with it."

As for his work so far as the interim coach, Cannella has received praise from many of his players, and the attitude is positive.

"I think he's an excellent coach," said senior attackman Mike Valente. "He has instilled discipline that hasn't been there in past years.

"Greg gets what he wants done. I am pleased with him as our coach."

"The team has definitely come into its own," said sophomore attackmen Brendan Glass. "Greg has done his own thing, and it is more disciplined. He's tough, and he stresses hustle.

"It's good that they are finally making a decision. It would be kind of strange to have someone else come in out of the blue after Greg has been coaching us all this time."

It is not clear when the final decision will be announced.

Volleyball improves to 21–3 with win

By Steven Grant
Collegian Correspondent

It is to be expected that the coach of any volleyball team, no matter what the caliber, will be disappointed after his or her team loses a match. But when a coach is upset about losing a single game after a 3–1 match victory, one can gather that the team in question is a rather good one.

That was exactly the case last night at Curry Hicks Cage as the University of Massachusetts volleyball team improved its overall record to 21–3, taking care of the Fairfield Lady Stags, 15–1, 15–10, 12–15, 15–2.

The Minutewomen came out roaring to open things up as they simply overwhelmed the Lady Stags (13–19) but steadily declined after that, beginning with game two.

"We agreed beforehand that we wanted to keep getting better as the game went on," said Massachusetts Coach Bonnie Kenny. "But instead, the complete opposite happened. We played progressively worse.

"Our serving and defense were poor in the second and third game especially. To sum it up, we got lazy."

That was certainly not the case early on, however. Fueled in part by the play of Leigh Readey, the team jumped out to a 1–0 lead. The freshman middle blocker finished with a team high .769 hitting percentage and played with the confidence of an upperclassman.

"I'm very happy with the way Leigh played tonight," Kenny said. "She had a great game. She was 11 for 13 in kills, and the one error she was credited with wasn't even her fault. Again, I'm very happy with her performance."

Giza Rivera also played well for the Minutewomen, who won their school record 13th match at home this season.

Rivera, an outside hitter, accumulated eight digs to go along with an impressive .419 hitting percentage. It marked the 22nd time this season that the sophomore reached double figures in kills, and the 13th consecutive match she has done so.

Game two appeared as if it would be similar to the first one, as the Minutewomen owned an 8–2 advantage. But Laura Gleason (.438 hitting percentage, four digs) and the Lady Stags put up a fight, coming as close as 10–6. However, UMass was able to walk away from this one victorious as well before Fairfield could mount anything serious.

Then, in the third game, it happened.

"We let them get back into the match, plain and simple," Kenny said. "We should have been able to do anything we wanted offensively. Once you let a team think they have a chance. . ."

UMass actually owned a 6–2 lead in this one before overconfidence set in. Eventually, Fairfield tied things up at eight, 10 and 12, before it went on to win the game's final three points. The Lady Stags even forced Kenny to call a timeout, which was not exactly in the game plan going into the match.

However, the Minutewomen rebounded, to say the least, in the fourth game. Dionne Nash probably played her best in this one, collecting five of her 13 kills. Nash picked up eight digs for the match.

Beth Cabral was her usual defensive self, as she led the team with nine digs, and setter Cass Anderson continued her consistency with 48 assists.

"As far as the first and the fourth game go, I think we played just great," Kenny said. "But in those middle two games, our hitters seemed to be hitting the ball straight down, which allowed them to get a lot of blocks. Instead, we should be hitting the ball more horizontally, towards the back of their defense."

"When you're playing teams of a lower caliber," Rivera said, "sometimes you start playing at their level. And I think that's what might have happened to us tonight. We might have lost our concentration out there a little."

This weekend, UMass hosts West Virginia and George Washington, both of whom the Minutewomen beat the first time around. Both the WVU and GW matches will have importance when it comes to determining seeds for the Atlantic 10 Tournament. With two victories, UMass would finish 9–3 in the A–10 and probably get a very high seed for the tourney.

Hard work has paid off for Nikki Ahrenholz

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

There were early mornings this past summer in Vail, Colo., when Nikki Ahrenholz would practically beat the sunrise, waking up at dawn. Soccer was on her mind.

At 6 a.m., she would attack the mountains and their mind–boggling elevation of 10,000 feet.

"My confidence was up," she said. "A lot of it was mental, believing that you can play. That's been a big part of it me, believing in myself."

In her first two years on the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, Ahrenholz had trouble coming to grips with the mental aspect of soccer, more specifically, believing in herself. It led to two rather uneventful seasons with nagging injuries hindering her progress.

But just as Ahrenholz, now a junior, attacked the mountains of Vail this summer, she met head on with the mental aspect of the game. Ever since, the results have been staggering and her play has been near–flawless.

A native of Englewood, Colo., she had what was perhaps the finest match of her career against Cornell this past Sunday in a must–win situation for the Minutewomen. She effectively shut down highly–touted Amy Finkelstein as UMass won the match 2–1. The team now appears primed for a wild card berth in the NCAA tournament.

Anchoring the left side of the defense while also having a key role in dropping back to "balance" the defense, Ahrenholz has been a steady, reliable performer all season. Her vision of the action in front of her makes her that much more effective.

So how did it all happen so fast? Where was the transformation from injury–plagued player to stalwart performer? What, all of a sudden, was she doing differently?

The answer was simple. It was in her mindset. The jolt of fresh perspective came over her in the spring of 1994.

"We had a scrimmage at UConn. . . and I just went out and decided that I was going to have fun that day," Ahrenholz said. "I started the game and played the best I've played since I've been here. I got that feeling back, the thrill of soccer and why I play it."

Ever since the experience at UConn, Ahrenholz tries to "recapture that feeling" every time she takes the field. Building off that scrimmage, she surrounded herself around the game of soccer this summer. This included the early morning run up the mountains, playing in a highly competitive league and coaching at two separate youth camps.

Ahrenholz had made a complete turnaround, and come the time to return to UMass this year it was quite evident to the coaching staff. Her relentless work ethic earned her a starting role, a true mark of her determination and grit. Her confidence had peaked.

"Physical preparation gives you maybe 20 percent of what you need to compete at this level. It's 80 percent mental," Assistant Coach April Kaier said. "It takes a while for players to grip that. The player has control of the mental aspect, no one else does. That's why it's the hardest to control.

"It says a lot for Nikki that she realized this and did something about it. She turned a negative into a positive and that's hard to do at this level. She's proof that if you stick to it, and if you want it bad enough, you can do it."

What is even more promising about the story is that it continues to blossom. Ahrenholz isn't satisfied, although she admits that "this year, it's great to be playing." She continues to work hard at improving her game — both physically and mentally.

"I don't feel like I've always had the best skills, but I feel like I'm always giving 110 percent, always there, always dedicated," she said. "I've never been physically talented. I feel I've always had to work really hard at it. It feels good that it's paying off."

The success Ahrenholz has recently garnered has left many opposing frontrunners looking for answers. Along with Heidi Kocher, Erin Lynch and Erica Iverson, she has helped form an airtight defensive corps. The task–oriented structure of the position is something she has taken to.

"I like the aspect of being told, 'This is your man, and you have to shut her down'," she said.

There was a time when Ahrenholz herself was almost shut down, struggling to grasp the mental aspect of soccer as her confidence plummeted. But just as she climbed the mountains at Vail this summer, attacking the elevation of 10,000 feet, Ahrenholz has worked her way back to a new level in soccer.

And well–deserved success has followed her right along the way.

Boston College just not as good as the hype

Trivia question: What is the most overrated sports program in the nation?

Answer: The Boston College Eagles.

BC is great. Just ask any one of their fans they'll be sure to tell you. Why?

Matt Vautour

"Well, we beat Notre Dame in football two years in a row. We beat North Carolina in basketball and went to the Final Eight and we beat Harvard to win the Beanpot," any true fan of the maroon and gold will answer immediately. They then will show you their T–shirt with the words "triple crown" written on it, further bragging about those three wins.

Hate to break it to all you little Eagle droppings, but three wins does not an athletic department make.

Hockey

When BC beat Harvard 2–1 in overtime to capture the 1994 Beanpot, the yahoos at the Heights had the nerve to dub this win the "Miracle on Ice II." The one and only Miracle on Ice, for anyone who doesn't remember 1980, was the United States hockey team beating the Soviets to eventually take the gold medal at the 1980 Olympics.

That the Eagle fans really think winning one game in a tournament for which the only significance is Boston bragging rights means anything — let alone measures up to the '80 gold — is ludicrous. Get over yourselves!

The once proud program that featured names like Craig Janney, Steve Heinze and Brian Leetch has fallen far. After Len Ceglarski retired, the program has fallen on hard times, which came to light this summer as former coach Steve Cedorchuck apparently offered more scholarships than he had available.

This year, the fans have abandoned their program. There were so few fans at their home opener that each fan could personally root for a separate player.

The team is at best mediocre. The best way to rebuild a program is to recruit from the vast talent available in Canada, as many programs have learned and used. However, the BC alumni frowns on Canadian recruiting because it "waters down their tradition."

With limited recruiting draw in the hockey rich Catholic High School conference BC will have trouble rebuilding, all because of silly tradition.

Basketball

Everyone dubbed BC last year's overachievers as the senior class of Bill Curley, Howard Eisley, Gerrod Abram and Malcom Huckaby led the team to the Elite Eight of the NCAA basketball tournament.

Turn to HYPE, page 8

The fact of the matter is that until a year ago this bunch was college hoop's biggest underachievers.

The class that included two current NBA players (Curley and Eisley) never even made the NCAA tournament and with the talent they had they certainly should have.

Eagle fans will crow till their voices hurt about their 75-72 upset of the No. 1-rated North Carolina Tar Heels. Granted they shot out of their minds from three-point land, but what they neglect to mention is that North Carolina played the crunchtime minutes of that game with a freshman point guard in the lineup. Why?

Because in the dirtiest play of the 1994 NCAA Tournament, BC power forward Danya Abrams clotheslined UNC starter Derrick Phelps on his way to the basket, sidelining the Tar Heel floor general with a concussion for the rest of the game.

Abrams should have been tossed from the game for the play, but instead finished and played well.

The Tar Heels should have been a title contender but the dirty play by the Eagles ended their run. Hardly something to cheer about Eagle fans.

Football

Since the days of Doug Flutie, the only thing BC football has ever done is beat Notre Dame.

After the 41-39 last-second victory over Notre Dame, one excited (intoxicated) BC fan told a television reporter that BC should get consideration for the National Title.

Hello. You still lost to Northwestern.

It starts with Athletic Director Chet Gladchuck and moves right on down.

Even the band is annoying. This "musical" ensemble knows about three pieces, including the Star Spangled Banner. The only time they play is when the PA system is saying something important.

Enough with the half hour TV specials and constant media attention. The Boston College sports program is overrated. Get over it.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Although a loved one may think that what you are doing is silly, you know better. Travel will not be worth the expense. Postpone a business trip. Co-workers are more congenial than they have been lately.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Focus your attention on career considerations today. Do not overlook the talent when searching for the extra. Get to know a new partner's views. Being familiar with an ally's quirks will make for a better week.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) The emphasis now is on regaining bad habits with good ones. Pursuing new interests will keep you from backsliding. Award challenging those in authority today.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Follow your sociable inclinations as long as they do not interfere with your duties and responsibilities. Those in charge may be overly demanding.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Take control of your financial destiny. It is better to be decisive and make an occasional mistake than to be afraid to act. Romance looks delightful for the truly eligible. Speak from the heart.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Listen to the voice of reason when making business choices. Practicality is a must! Excessive ambition can trip you up. Maintain your dignity and poise at all times. Resist the urge to tell someone off.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Remain where you are safe from temptation, out of the reach of someone who is selfish. An invitation to visit an ornately new place holds special appeal. Consult a wise friend before saying "yes" or "no."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Let your companions take all the financial risks now. Emphasize compassion over pride on your way to the top. Always be available to help your mate or business partner in case of an emergency.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Teach your loved ones to be more thrifty if you see that they are making serious inroads into your resources. Creative endeavors are the best cure for boredom. Suggest a contest or art fair.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Heed an instinct to be cautious. Do your work at home or wherever is most convenient. Acquiring specialized knowledge will help you protect your assets. Be open-minded about new methods and procedures.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) A friendly atmosphere helps your associates receive their allotments and adapt a course as directed. Show restraint when dealing with relatives or at questions on who opposes your views. Time will prove you right.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Although your optimism is commendable, you must be careful not to get overboard. Evaluate current and coming trends. A gentle conciliatory approach will restore harmony at home. Unexpected visitors could alter your evening plans.

Wanda waited night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had sedated the man in the yellow hat and had commandeered the Prince of Malawi's limo, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with

Athletes' grades shown to class

Local reporter reveals Black athletes' academic records to journalism class

By Justin Doyle and Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

A news writer from the Springfield Union News distributed a copy of confidential academic information about Black student athletes and transcripts of the men's basketball players during a journalism class on Tuesday.

Brad Smith, a reporter for the Union News revealed to a Media Criticism class taught by Steve Simurda, that he had received the same material used in the controversial Boston Globe article that ran Oct. 19.

The article revealed that four UMass players were on academic probation and listed the grade point averages of six team members.

Smith showed not only the academic transcripts for basketball players, but also a document that contained the names of Black student athletes and their grade point averages to the Media Criticism class.

Chancellor David K. Scott issued a memorandum in response to the distribution of the confidential academic records of student athletes in a UMass journalism classroom.

"We are looking into those reports right now and will be talking to the faculty member in charge of the class," Scott said.

The University is planning to investigate and determine what action would be taken, according Scott.

"If a faculty member allowed the distribution of such documents to his class, he exhibited at the least, poor judgement, verging on unethical behavior," Scott said. "After determining the course of events, we will decide whether to take disciplinary action in the matter."

Chair of the Journalism Department Howard Ziff said that he was told Smith would speak to the Media Criticism class, but had no knowledge that the Union News reporter would show the transcripts to students.

"The instructor never saw what [Smith] passed out," Ziff said. "I had no idea what it was that he had."

Simurda was out of town at a conference and could not be reached for comment.

Smith said that he was invited by Simurda to talk to the Media Criticism class about his story about the basketball team.

"I agreed to come into the class and talk about the story of the basketball players grades," Smith said.

Smith admitted that the material which he passed around to the students in the class included a list of Black Student Athletes, their "GPAs and other information."

"I didn't think it was relevant to the story, I didn't really look at the other records," Smith said.

REBECCA PETERSON / COLLEGIAN

M. Ricardo Townes, assistant vice chancellor of campus activities spoke yesterday at a forum which discussed issues surrounding the release of the men's basketball team's academic records to the media.

M. Ricardo Townes, assistant vice chancellor of student activities, addressed the issue at a forum in the Campus Center last night. After being questioned, Townes talked specifically about Smith's actions in the journalism class.

"For [Smith] to think that there are no racial implications regarding the handing out of the academic records is one of the most incredulous forms of racism," Townes said. "I think that a guy like Brad Smith is just trying to make a name for himself."

Smith cited his reasons for revealing the information he received from an unidentified source which contributed to a front page story in the Union News on Oct. 20.

New sister chaplain adds fresh outlook to Newman

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — After over a year of searching, the Newman Center welcomes Sister Kathleen Keough to their staff.

The Rev. Francis P. Lavelle said the addition of a woman to the Newman Center staff adds a whole new dimension to the center which he said has been missing.

"There are a lot of people who relate better to a woman — especially women," Lavelle said. "Sister Kathleen offers a different dimension like Deacon [Lucien] Miller adds as a married man. [I] am a celibate priest, [I] can't bring the dimension that a woman brings."

The call for a new sister chaplain came a year ago when Sister Milenda Marengo retired after 15 years. This happened right when Lavelle took the job as director of the Newman Center. He said he immediately posted the job opening, but no one applied.

"When Father Lavelle was appointed, I talked to him," Keough said. "I knew he was looking for a woman on the staff."

Keough said she was on sabbatical at the time, but was not sure if the Newman Center was what she wanted.

"Sister Milly Marengo connected me with a lot of people at the Newman Center," Keough said. "I loved the spirit here, and I loved the people."

She arrived on campus three days ago, and commutes everyday from Chicopee.

"I see my position as campus minister," said Keough. "As being a caring presence for students, faculty and staff."

Keough said the first thing she has to do is to get to know the students and faculty before she can implement any changes.

"I have only been here for two days," said Keough. "I need to be here for a year and listen to what the students needs are — only then would I talk about change."

She said one of her positions at the center will be working on the Right of Christian Initiation for Adults program.

"It's for older people who are interested in becoming Catholics," Keough said.

According to Keough, in the past it would have been unusual in the Catholic Church to have a woman as sister chaplain.

"It's very common now," said Lavelle. "They have been in public hospitals for 25 years. The sister before her was here for 15 years."

She said that although she is hired by the diocese of Student arraigned on kidnapping and assault charges

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

A 35-year-old University of Massachusetts junior was arraigned yesterday for kidnapping and assault and battery in a residence hall early yesterday morning.

Gregory P. Martin of 9 Longneck Road in Onset and an environmental science was released on $500 bond after being arraigned in Hampshire County District Court for charges of breaking and entering in the night time, intent to commit a felony, assault and battery, and kidnapping.

Police responded at approximately 12:08 a.m. yesterday to a report by a woman in MacNamara Residence Hall in the Sylvan Residential Area. Martin entered the room she was in at the time uninvited, according to Karin Sherbin, University spokeswoman.

It is unclear whether the woman was a UMass student.

Sherbin said Martin allegedly closed and locked the room door behind him and would not allow the woman to leave the room. After closing the door, Martin allegedly made comment of a sexual nature towards the woman, according to Sherbin.

Martin is being charged with kidnapping for holding the woman against her will in the room.

Once Martin left the room, police reported the woman attempted to walk down the hall. Sherbin said Martin was still in the area when the woman left the room and allegedly grabbed her from behind as she walked down the hallway.

Sherbin said she did not know if Martin and the woman were acquainted.

The case is continued until Dec. 8. Martin was ordered a stay away order according to Sherbin.

Steinem speaks out for Kennedy in senate race

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

While Romney has shifted his views on abortion from anti-choice to multiple choice, Kennedy has continued to hold onto his fundamental concern for the working class, according to activist Gloria Steinem.

Steinem, a well-known feminist, political activist, journalist and author, endorsed Sen. Edward Kennedy yesterday at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Basement on behalf of his campaign for re-election.

"There seems to be enormous bias against old leadership," Steinem said. "This anti-incumbent movement is wrong and self-defeating."

Kennedy, who has held office for 32 years, has a history of working for women's rights, healthcare and education. He has worked hard to attain equality and social justice and has always been the one to stand up for what is right, Steinem said.

Kennedy promotes the Access to Clinics Act, to give women the freedom to enter abortion clinics for legal abortions, she said.

Steinem, who is in great opposition to Romney's alter-approaches to abortion, wore two bracelets commemorating victims of abortion mishaps and presented them to reinforce a point.

One bracelet represented Becky Bell, a woman who died in 1988 from an illegal abortion because of the parental consent law. She did not want to tell her parents and ended up suffering complications from a faulty abortion.

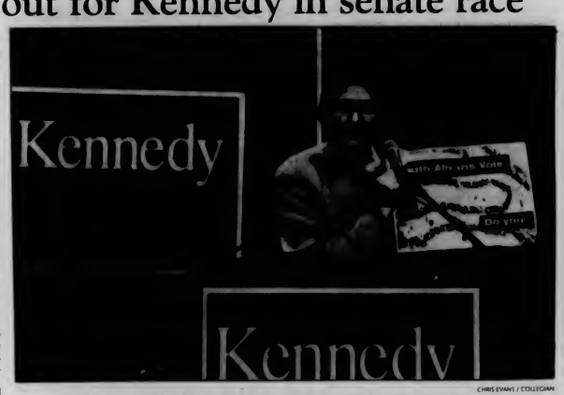
The other was in memory of the first woman who died of an illegal abortion, because of laws restricting her from receiving a legitimate operation, Steinem said.

"Those women are our sisters," Steinem said. "If we vote for Romney, we are not voting for ourselves."

Women should be working toward sustaining their self-respect, and should vote for a candidate who will enable them to do so, she said.

Historically, women have held labor-intensive roles and have not obtained a substantial amount of capital, she said. Low-income women are now working to obtain capital by starting up cooperatively-owned businesses.

The Home Health Care Associates in Bronx, N.Y. was started and run by Afro-American and Latino women. This enterprise, and others like it, have produced more jobs than the Fortune 500, Steinem said.



CHRIS EVANS / COLLEGIAN

Gloria Steinem endorsed Senator Edward Kennedy in the Campus Center basement yesterday.

Kennedy promotes this type of economic growth through loan programs, training programs and financial security.

His strategy is to have individuals continue to receive welfare while they are in the process of getting themselves back on their feet. This gives them time to effectively channel their efforts, Steinem said.

His ideas of boosting employment rates are to give tax credits to companies who hire poor people. This would be a corrupt system of internal colonialism, according to Steinem.

Welfare reform is attracting great attention from the Senate, and with these tactics reflecting Romney's ideas about welfare, a victory in the race could lead to enormous problems and dangers, she said.

"Kennedy is the person we absolutely need in Educational equality addressed at conference

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

The correlation between education, success and gender will be the topic of a national conference to be held at Mount Holyoke College this weekend.

The Women's College Coalition presents "Studies in Success: Applying Effective Models to Educating Women and Girls" beginning Friday and coming to a close on Sunday. The Women's College Coalition consists of 70 women's colleges in the United States and Canada.

This is the first national conference to bring educational researchers, academic administrators, policy makers and the media together to discuss models for education women and girls.

"I think that the fact we have 300 educators, researchers and policy makers, some of which are presidents of colleges, is significant," said Media Relations Director Kevin McCaffrey.

McCaffrey said that the real purpose of the conference is to take "a hard look at research." He said that the focus should be on enforcing policies on both a national and state level to improve women's access to education, and increase the opportunities in higher education for low-income women.

Jadwiga Sebrechts, executive director of the Women's College Coalition said that the conference will provide a forum to address these issues and to "institute approaches that will work for female students."

"The Studies in Success conference represents an important step in examining methods and approaches that are demonstrably effective [in ensuring women's academic and career success]," Sebrechts said.

Women's Education Not Equal

According to McCaffrey, the conference is a reaction to numerous studies and publications which indicate that girls and young women across the country are not receiving an education equal to that of males.

"Study after study points to the fact that girls and young women fall behind in educational experience, not only academically, but in their confidence in their academic ability," McCaffrey said.

One such study was conducted by Mount Holyoke College in 1981, and was sponsored by the American Association of University Women. Also used as a basis for this data was Myra and David Sadker's Failing at Fairness.

"There is a growing realization among educators, government officials and the public that our educational system as a whole is not getting the job done for girls and young women," said Elizabeth T. Kennan, president of Mount Holyoke College.

"Our failure to educate girls has profound social ramifications for our society, our economy, and our culture," Kennan said. "Leaving one gender behind continues to impede our nation's progress."

Single-sex Vs. Coed Institutions

An important topic of the conference will explore the results of studies of single-sex and co-ed institutions. According to these studies, girls and young women who study in single-sex environments reach higher levels of achievement than those who attend coed institutions.

According to the Women's College Coalition, graduates of women's colleges are twice as likely to earn doctorates as women of coed institutions.

McCaffrey also said a correlation between the study of science, engineering and math at women's colleges and career success will be discussed in the realm of single-sex and coed education comparisons.

"Research shows that girls and young women do not perform as well as boys in a range of academic areas and enter fields — especially in areas of math and science — with less frequency," Sebrechts said.

The Women's College Coalition claims that women of single-sex colleges are three times as likely to earn degrees in economics, one and one-half times as likely to graduate in math and

Heated debate erupts at lecture about different religious groups

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

A lecture on the good and bad sides of religion last night turned into a heated debate as a local minister questioned the accusations made by a Boston University Dean.

Dean Robert Thornburg of BU spoke at Memorial Hall last night on the subject of sectarian religions. He addressed the questions people may ask before pursuing an interest in a particular organized religion.

"Religion is a big item, isn't it," Thornburg said. "Most of the wars going on right now have to do with religious topics and religious bigotry."

People turn to religious sects because they seek absolute certainty, said Thornburg. He gave the examples of Jim Jones, who had himself and his entire congregation commit mass suicide by drinking cyanide laced Kool-Aid, and David Koresh, whose religious compound was surrounded by the FBI and burnt to the ground, resulting in the death of himself and many of his followers.

"How could people of normal intelligence get involved in such a faith that they could commit themselves to suicide," Thornburg said.

Thornburg said there are certain signs people should look for when considering a certain religious organization.

Thornburg listed things such as lack of honesty, harassment, compulsory donations, losing contact with family and friends, and compulsory recruitment as signs of dangerous sects.

Thornburg then presented a news brief from Inside Edition where he was interviewed about the actions of the Church of Jesus Christ in Boston.

Washington," State Rep. Ellen Story, who was in attendance, said. "If Romney is elected, the repercussions will be horrendous."

Steinem, who agreed with Story, encouraged students to vote and get their "regular excersize by using their political muscle."

"She did a real good job and addressed specific issues," Neil Carpenter, a senior corporate finance major, said. "She gave specific reasons on why to vote Kennedy, and specific reasons on why not to vote for Romney."

Steinem is a co-founder of both Ms. Magazine and NY Magazine, and has been a feminist lecturer since 1969.

She has written several books and worked on a number of civil rights, peace and political campaigns.

Steinem requested to speak at UMass while she was in the area visiting various colleges, because she did not want to just talk to private schools, according to Naomi Seligman, a UMass senior and co-coordinator of Kennedy's campaign on campus.

"She wanted to reach out to the public schools the way Kennedy always has."

'Day of the Dead' celebrated by student

UMass senior honors Latin American tradition with ritual and the burning of effigies

By Nathan Martin and Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

NATHAN MARTIN \ COLLEGIAN

Juan Jose Chacon Quiros incorporated cows' blood, fire and political symbols to celebrate the Day of the Dead on the Student Union steps yesterday.

Yesterday afternoon the University of Massachusetts Campus Center area smelled like burnt hay and blood — remnants of a religious display commemorating the Day of the Dead.

Senior Juan Jose Chacon Quiros, an economics and Latin American studies major, splattered six gallons of cow's blood on the Student Union Steps and threw five cow hearts in celebration of the Day of the Dead, a Latin American tradition in which those who have died in Latin America are remembered and honored.

Chacon Quiros dressed as the bird, quetzal, the guardian angel of Tecun Uman, who fought against the Spanish conquistadors in Latin America in the 16th century. Face painted gold, he wore a green flowing cape with brightly colored chest and feathered headband.

Chacon Quiros said the Day of the Dead is a yearly celebration.

"The Day of the Dead is a time to actually feel death," Chacon Quiros said. "That people die in the struggle for freedom is unfortunate."

The celebration began at around 1 p.m. yesterday with Chacon Quiros lighting the effigies of Presidents Clinton, Bush and Reagan, Oliver North and National Security Advisor Anthony Lake. All were chosen for their policies sanctioning intervention in Latin America, Chacon Quiros said. He said modern day political figures were chosen, but he said many leaders throughout American history could have been used in their place.

Indian religious music played throughout the event as Chacon Quiros addressed the crowd, danced and laid flowers at a black cross in honor of slain Latin American nationalists.

"People in the United State who have died for the same thing [freedom] are heroes," Chacon Quiros said. "Don't kill our heroes."

Several rumors circulated campus yesterday that dogs and other animals were sacrificed. Chacon Quiros said he obtained the blood and hearts at a nearby slaughterhouse.

"It wasn't supposed to upset anyone," he said.

University spokeswoman Karin Sherbin said University police officials spoke with Chacon Quiros, but did not arrest him or bring any charges against him because it was part of a religious tradition.

A police official said when asked if Chacon Quiros was going to be arrested, "freedom — it's called freedom."

Sherbin said University Environmental Health and Safety officials cleaned the Student Union Steps upon Chacon Quiros conclusion.

Bosnian war victims aided by food drive and concert

By Adam Rottner
Collegian Correspondent

Friends of Bosnia will have a benefit concert tonight to raises funds for its Mass. Aid Drive which will collect at least 10 tons of essential food and medical supplies to aid civilian war victims in Bosnia.

Glen Ruga, co-director of Friends of Bosnia, said, "We will be shipping food and supplies on commercial charters to Split, Croatia, where Edinburgh Direct Aid, a Scottish humanitarian aid group will distribute it."

"Clinton and the United Nations currently have an arms embargo on Bosnia. If the United Nations decides to lift the embargo Clinton will be forced to comply with them. He will lift the arms embargo," Ruga said.

Sharon Webb, also a co-director of Friends of Bosnia, said, "Our aid will contribute substantially to the well-being of some of the neediest of Bosnia's war victims."

Local songwriters and internationally-known recording artists will be performing, including Cliff Eberhardt, Amy Fairchild, Chris Haynes, Peter Nelson, Justin and Joyce, Louise Taylor, Erica Wheeler and Croatian pianist and songwriter Radislav Lorkovic.

According to Court Clien of the Amherst bookstore Food for Thought Books, Justina and Joyce are, "really excellent; they have incredible harmonies, and they sing music from various cultures."

Clien compared Erica Wheeler, another local, to Mary Chapin Carpenter. "She is a folk artist, as is Amy Fairchild, who is from Northampton," he said.

The drive will cover all of Massachusetts in communities and colleges. Contributing organizations will collect items deemed necessary such as medical supplies and equipment, nutritious non-perishable food, and household toiletries.

Sponsors of the drive include Physicians for Human Rights from Boston; the Jewish Federation of Greater Springfield; Islamic Council of Western Massachusetts; and Lutheran Social Services of New England.

The concert will be held at 7:30 p.m. at the First Church on 129 Main St. in Northampton. There will be a $10 admission fee.

"Whether God be Allah, or Mohammed, it's all a matter of being more loving people," Keough said.

Keough said she is available to help students and faculty with their religion.

"I think that young people struggle with questions of faith," she said. "A lot of young people just don't have time for religion, but we need to help them when they need guidance."

"I had felt a keen awareness that there was a woman missing from the staff," Lavelle said. "When she came here, the skies opened up and the sun shined down."

church described the church as browbeating, lying, manipulative and generally power hungry.

Others interviewed claimed the church changed their lives greatly for the better. Some of those interviewed said the church saved their marriage, got them off drugs, and helped them lead better lives.

Stephen Green, a minister of the Church of Jesus Christ located in Springfield, was in the audience. Green said Thornburg's lecturing on campus is in violation of guidelines set fourth by the Dean of Students regarding respecting the religious rights of others. Green said Thornburg's calling the Church of Christ members liars is slanderous and in violation of policy.

A woman from the audience commented that Thornburg was not affiliated with UMass and was not bound by UMass guidelines.

Thornburg asked Green his opinion on the visit of Louis Farrakhan to the UMass campus. Green said Farrakhan made no bigoted or racist remarks and did not violate UMass policy.

Green said Church of Christ members have been approached by UMass professors and police and have been threatened with arrest.

Thornburg said when all documentation of the complaints were investigated they were found to be flawed.

"I know nothing about the Church of Christ of Springfield," Thornburg said. "I know a lot about Boston."

Vote for Kennedy

This election year its been more difficult than ever to distinguish the issues from the mudslinging. The senatorial race between incumbent Sen. Edward Kennedy and his challenger Mitt Romney has been no different. However in looking directly at the issues we feel the decision is clear.

For 32 years, Kennedy has been an active and successful player in addressing the social concerns of Americans on both the national and state level. His record speaks for itself.

Kennedy has proven himself as a leader in improving the education system of America. On the college level, Kennedy has actively sought to improve and increase access to higher education.

He has been the chief sponsor in legislation that has expanded the availability and eligibility of financial aid, and improved the student loan processes. He has also been the chief supporter in granting Federal research grants for universities.

Kennedy has actively fought against the status quo, authoring, sponsoring and introducing legislation that directly confronts discrimination. His efforts have helped women, minorities and gays in their fight for equality.

In his 32 years as a Massachusetts Senator, Kennedy has built up a power base that Massachusetts cannot afford to lose. His bi-partisan support has brought about needed legislation, that might have been lost had it not been for his influence.

If the last 32 years of active participation, influence and work is any indication of what we can expect for the next six, Kennedy is the best and only choice.

Notes from the Basement

Politics suck.

With the election approaching, candidates are making last minute pitches toward different groups, hoping to sway votes just before the polls open on Tuesday.

There is no exception with the students here at the University — as we saw in the presidential election of 1992, students have an impact when volumes of kids pack the polls and voice their concerns on many issues facing society today.

Yeah, yeah, yeah . . . the bottom line is that politicians are the masters of public relations, and stunts pulled in the weeks leading up to the elections are used to manipulate students.

In Massachusetts, Democratic candidate for governor Mark Roosevelt, recognizing the importance of the State U. in the Commonwealth, made a trip to the Student Union Steps here on campus. He urged students to have a voice.

"For too long, we've had governors in Massachusetts who haven't understood the importance of public higher education," Roosevelt said, in person, to a crowd of more than 100 students. "I stand for a democratic state which will stand with working people and stand with college students."

Roosevelt's opponent, Gov. William Weld, has not been to Amherst during his campaign. However, on Monday morning, Weld, along with Lt. Gov. Paul Celluci, announced that he had filed a $7.4 million bond to improve athletic facilities for women's sports teams at the University.

Weld made that announcement in Boston. Not in Amherst.

This whole incident shows the power an incumbent possesses in the run for re-election.

Students and administrators from the University had to go to Boston just to see Weld — Roosevelt came to UMass to speak to the students.

Talk about timing. It's nice to see the funds beginning to flow to the University's athletic program, especially to the women's sports teams on campus.

However, to put it into perspective — Title IX requirements were enforced over two years ago.

Why did Weld wait until a week before the election to get the University involved in his campaign?

Just a thought.

• • • •

Sports Illustrated and The Boston Globe have enjoyed taking pot shots at classes here at the University over the last few weeks.

In SI's Scorecard, there was a story headlined "U-Mess," in which classes such as Sports Broadcasting and Sex, Drugs and AIDS were ridiculed.

As far as I know, no administrative responses to each publication are planned, leaving the fighting back to alumni and current students who are sick and tired of taking undeserved criticism.

While administrators are remaining very professional, some students are wondering why their classes aren't being defended by anyone.

Silence is golden, yet how can students take the classes and remain confident that what they are learning isn't a joke if the people who are teaching them won't stand up and defend them?

Incidentally, for anyone whose parents couldn't make it, last weekend was Parents Weekend. Oh, what? You didn't know either?

In typical UMass fashion, letters about Parents Weekend were sent to the homes, leaving it up to parents to tell students about the blessed event.

That makes almost as much sense as sending senior picture information to the parents of graduating seniors. Hopefully Mom and Dad remembered to tell the happy grad-to-be about that one.

Does this line sound familiar, "No picture available?" I wonder if I'd be a smiley face or the grumpy one.

Letters to the Editor

Question 9 affects students

To the editor:

Please join with us to defeat Question 9, the proposed initiative petition to prohibit rent control programs in Massachusetts.

Question 9 sets a dangerous precedent for all renters, particularly students living in the town of Amherst.

A yes vote on the question will immediately eliminate the power of the town's Housing Review Board to lower excessive rents charged by Amherst landlords to student tenants.

It is no secret that until renters in Amherst secured the Housing Review Board in 1986 (after a decade plus of advocacy by agencies such as the Legal Services Center and Off Campus Housing Office) the lack of any regulatory controls for the determination of a fair rent resulted in the overpricing of large portions of Amherst's rental housing stock.

This rental stock included those units where the majority of students reside — the major apartment complexes.

This overpricing, corcomitant with landlords terminating their previous obligation to furnish tenants with utilities formerly provided by them (heat, electricity, gas) put an added unfair cost burden on Amherst renters that the town's Housing Review Board has attempted to correct since the Board's founding.

It is clear that unless Question 9 is defeated, student renters will be expected to pay rents in excess of what they can afford and what is fair. The first Board case illustrates this point well.

In its first ruling the Board voted to set the rent for all two-bedroom complexes at the Crown Point complexes at $499 per month — $81 less than the rent set by the complex's management company or a savings of $1000 every lease year!

The establishment of the Housing Review Board has also had other positive side effects for Amherst renters. A number of tenants have reported an increase in the speed and number of repairs being performed since the Board was enacted.

And, lower rents for tenants means that overcrowding due to high rents has become more the exception than the rule in the town.

Question 9 must be defeated. Students who choose to live in Amherst as an alternative to the University's residence hall system should not be penalized for their off campus housing choice.

Question 9 is not just an attack on the current systems we have to protect tenants, it bans any Massachusetts city or town from enacting similar laws — no matter how urgently needed.

Question 9 is special interest legislation at its most irresponsible and it sets a dangerous precedent by eroding local control to make rental housing affordable.

Do the right thing — Vote No on Question 9.

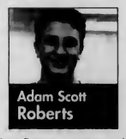
THE ACCEPTABLE KIND OF SIDE IMPACT

Security could limit access to gov't



On Saturday President Clinton was back home in Washington and relaxing while watching television. It was a beautiful weekend in our nation's capitol, and business was usual with tourists squirming all over D.C., catching glimpses of historic sites. One of the greatest sites of all is the white mansion located at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, The White House.

However, on this particular day things were not business as usual. Francisco M. Duran of Colorado had an agenda of his own, and it wasn't getting his picture snapped in front of the Executive Mansion. For Duran, pulling out a semi- automatic Chinese-made SKS assault rifle while spraying the White House with 20-30 rounds was more exciting than say, a stroll through Anacostia. Now, any American citizen would think that the Secret Service would have stopped this man immediately and/or possibly taken him out by the sharpshooters positioned on the White House roof. However, this was not the case. Instead two tourists jumped Duran and got him to the ground, and then the Secret Service decided to intervene and take over from there to avoid any further embarrassments.

According to White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta, the Secret Service riflemen on the roof of the White house had their guns trained on Duran, but chose not to fire for fear of killing nearby tourists. At the same time one must question what could have happened: What if reporters were on the front lawn doing their live reports? What if a bullet that entered the mansion hit members of the media in the press room or government officials? Or what if a bullet struck Chelsea or Hillary? For the White House to downplay this incident is absurd. This could have been a much bigger episode than it is being played out to be where people could have been seriously harmed.

"Sharpshooters had him in their sights, but they were concerned about hitting innocent civilians," Panetta told ABC News when asked why it was left to passers-by to subdue Duran. What does this say about the safety of the President when passers-by are being relied on to help out as a civil duty? What if the two brave men who tackled Duran ran like others did? What if Duran was able to reload the semi-automatic and continued shooting?

This recent incident has forced a new focus on the security of the President and the security at the White House. The Secret Service is once again questioning whether or not to close Pennsylvania Avenue, one of D.C.'s busiest streets in order to provide better security to the First Family while at home.

At the same time, one should know that not all windows are bullet-proof at the White House. And why aren't the window's bullet proof in rooms such as the press briefing room where the President and government officials venture which, in fact was hit by Duran. After all, the windows there directly face the very same street that Duran stood from to shoot through the cast-iron gates. Why did it take so long for the Secret Service to assist the civilian heros? The sharpshooters shouldn't have feared taking out Duran. Aren't those sharpshooters professional and expert enough to precisely hit someone like Duran in such a situation and reduce risks to other civilians?

Was this an assassination attempt on the President's life? Officials aren't sure yet. As of now, Duran, who is in custody has been charged of destruction of government property and illegal possession of a firearm by a convicted felon in addition to two other charges. However, if it is confirmed that Duran in fact was trying to take the life of Clinton, he could face life in prison. As of now, Duran has four charges against him, and if convicted on all four of these lesser charges, Duran may get a maximum sentence of 35 years in prison.

So, what's the solution? The Secret Service would like to close Pennsylvania Avenue to the public. However, President Clinton won't allow it and justifiably so. The White House is the house of our elected official. As citizens, it is our right to be able to visit the White House. This is a symbol of democracy. Americans enjoy the freedom and privilege of having that closeness to political power; to tour the White House and to see the house of the President which is also the house of the people. By closing Pennsylvania Avenue the American people will be isolated from those who govern, and that would be a step backwards.

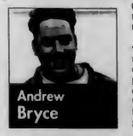
Trying to survive the day from hell



I slowly and very painfully wake up from an average four- hour sleeping night after smacking the snooze button at least five times. As I get out of bed, I accidently hit my head on the top bunk. I then curse to myself out loud as I frantically rub my head.

I open the door, and get my newspaper. I hurriedly open it up, and the sports page is missing. Swearing once again and threatening the world for stealing my beloved Boston Globe sports page, my leg then begins to shake because I have to urinate. I still remain in the room and get a marker and a piece of paper to write a nasty note to the little punk thief that stole my sports page. The marker doesn't work.

Completely frustrated, I have to run up a flight of stairs to go to the bathroom because the one some five steps from my dorm room is a women's room. I then head to the shower, complete with my still-damp-from-the-day-before towel, my shampoo bottle that has been cut open to gather any last drops, and a piece of soap that has but a lather left.

I proceed to take off my clothes and get under the nozzle. After I am soaked, I realize that the shower stall I'm in does not have a curtain. The unbearbale breeze hits me as I begin to use extreme vulgarity, this time towards the shower head.

Suddenly, cold water shoots out of the nozzle as I jump back, compliments of the person who just took a dump and flushed the toilet. Swears spew from my mouth at the guy sitting on the john.

After getting dressed and gathering my books, I briskly walk to class. Water streams out of my eyes as I walk, a testament to the harsh-blowing wind and the lack of sleep the night before.

Speaking of testament, I am then given a New Testament Bible from people standing beside packed-boxes of them. To get to my class, I am also harassed to get a credit card, asked to give blood, and solicited for money to aid someone's trip abroad. I shake my head, and bitch to myself.

I finally get to class, and have a hard time trying to keep my eyes from shutting. I attempt to write the notes, but I end up finishing the sentence with a long line, a sign of falling asleep before the thought is finished. I then wake up and look at the clock to see what time it is. 12:16 — same damn time as it was five minutes ago, and the same damn time it will be five minutes later on that same, damn broken clock. By now, I am outraged.

Class ends as I head to my room to meet my roommate for lunch. We walk down the stairs to the DC, only I accidently stumble, and listen as my perceptive roommate makes fun of me for the next five minutes.

We then get to the DC, where delicious baked scrod and scrumptious quiche are being served. This time, I hold back in swearing at the DC workers, and mumble to myself in defiance. I go get a drink, only to have my rootbeer flat and the coke taste like seltzer water. We sit down at a dirty table, as I push all of the cumbersome promotional flyers to the side.

My roommate and I head back to the room, as he continues to bother me. Punching me, laying on me, doing anything and everything to make me scream obscenities. Much obliged, I swear for all to hear.

My day continues with much of the same, and I return to the room around 10 p.m. I order out for dinner, since I didn't have time before. I order a sandwich and a soda. The delivery comes and they forget the soda.

Cursing in the elevator as I head up to my room, I look at the doors in front of me — and hanging there is this large snot staring me in the face. Half as good as the unknown adhesive stuff that my shoes are sticking to on the elevator floor. Disgusted, I get off . . . the elevator, that is, and head to my room.

I throw my bag down, and go to put in a CD. I lay down to finally relax — and the CD begins to skip. I try to be patient, and wipe it off. I put it back in, and it still skips. Pissed off, I take the CD out and turn on the television.

I go to turn on my man David Letterman, and realize that Channel 3 comes in fuzzy on my television. Sick of Leno and the news shows, the only other things on are SCOLA and WOCH.

I realize that it's probably time for me to go to bed. So, I go to turn off the light, and — get this — my light switch breaks. I am unable to turn my light off in my room when I go to sleep. Let the swearing begin.

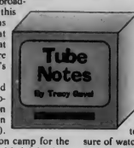
Halloween TV tricks & treats



Well, Halloween is over and now the time has come to tally up all of the dismembered television corpses from the past week. Alas, I was unable to find a broadcast of the "Peanuts" Halloween special this year. Apparently the classic cartoon has become almost as elusive as The Great Pumpkin himself. I just can't believe that he could have found a television set more 'sincere' than mine to appear on. There's always next year, (sigh) I guess.

In lieu of Charlie Brown, however, I did watch the hilariously weird animated program "Tales from the Far Side," based on the deadpan comic strip by Gary Arson (who, unfortunately, is retiring next year). My favorite segment involved a recreation camp for the living dead where cadavers could be found indulging in a leisurely swim or hayride, as their decaying body parts quivered and crumbled. And the part where a family of snakes gathered to watch a juicy and flavorful Marsha get eaten on "The Bacon Bunch," was pretty amusing too.

I also caught the terrific fifth annual "Simpsons" marathon on Fox. Highlights featured Bart being chased down by the cannibalistic elementary school faculty and Homer feeling the pangs of rejection from a group of brain- hungry zombies (who found he had nothing to offer).

This week I also saw ABC's "Full House" — the show that looks deceptively real despite its unmistakably cartoonish characters. In that episode, viewers had the displeasure of watching star John Stamos sing a fragmented ren-

With a new movie, another TV spinoff and nostalgia at an all-time high, Star Trek is truly a pop-cultural phenomenon...

GENERATION 'TREK'

...but are the phasers on overkill?

Space truly is the final frontier and in an age full of new technologies and innovations some might say that the gateway to another galaxy can't be far off.

Starship Enterprise's Captain James T. Kirk first pledged 28 years ago to boldly go where no man has gone before. A century later, Captain Jean-Luc Picard echoed the Enterprise's mission by updating the pledge to "no one."

This quest for excellence has been used and applied to any and all situations. It is this quest to explore the final frontier that set star "Trek" among the great TV legends. The crew of the Enterprise has been elevated to cult status with numerous Trekkies scattered globally holding conventions, writing books and creating fan clubs.

Even Internet has jumped on the "Trek" bandwagon by creating several Trekkie bulletin boards and talk lines (the script to Star Trek: Generations was illegally published on it).

Now, with the eagerly awaited Generations opening up in a few weeks, the buzz has grown stronger. "Star Trek" has moved on from being weird and unknown to wildly accessible in a matter of a few decades. When Gene Roddenberry, "The Great Bird in the Sky," first dreamed of "Star Trek" — his "wagon to the stars" — in the early 1960s, one has to wonder if he knew how popular the show would become.

The basic idea behind the series was to put thousands of people in a ship bigger than the largest ocean liner and set it into space. It would be exploring space in an era where men knew no fear and exploration was the prime reason for living. The drama would not only involve people encountering other civilizations and aliens, but also deal with the inner turmoil people face on an everyday basis in a fresh atmosphere with different pressures.

NBC and Roddenberry made a lot of compromises. "The Cage" was finally filmed sans Captain Kirk (Jeffery Hunt played a Captain Pike). But the studio rejected it on the grounds that it was too intellectual and text heavy. Three more scripts were written and William Shatner and Leonard Nimoy were hired. Finally, the first episode, "Man Trap," aired September 1966 and from then on the names Kirk, Sulu, Spock, Uhura, Scotty and McCoy were destined for greatness.

This idea would continue to flourish for more than 30 years, taking the Enterprise and its crew through three seasons of syndicated action, adventure and danger in space along with six movies as well.

It was on the Enterprise that viewers were first introduced to Vulcans, Tribbles, Romulans, Milquetoast, Scalosians and a shape shifter named Nancy (Man Trap). Time rifts, transporter glitches, warp drives and phasers on overload became jargon associated with the newly bonded Trekkies. The show also aired the first interracial kiss between Kirk and Uhura in "Plato's Stepchildren" (it took 36 takes).

Despite several campaigns to see that the crew completed it's five year mission, "Star Trek" fell in the ratings to "Mission: Impossible" and was eventually cancelled after its third session with "Turnabout Intruder," which aired in 1973.

However, re-runs that aired after the cancellation strangely increased the show's popularity adding more viewers to its cult following. In fact, the first "Trek" convention was held a year before the show's cancellation in 1972. Organizers expected a few hundred to show, but the count ended up to be well over 3,000.

So what was next for the crew of the Enterprise? Many of them turned out to do commercials, cameos, politics and even tried their hands in the recording studio. An attempt at another "Star Trek" series was attempted in 1977, but nothing came of it.

It wasn't until two years later that the faithful crew would once again take to the bridge and continue the "Star Trek" saga with Star Trek: The Motion Picture. Paramount released the film in December 1979 which premiered in Washington D.C. also in December. The Smithsonian Museum celebrated this film by placing a permanent model of the USS Enterprise on display. The movie was a successful surprise and it spawned a slew of scripts for other films.

Star Trek II: The Wrath of Khan (1982) is perhaps the film to launch a thousand ships. Based on the episode "Space Seed" where Khan, a 20th-century Earth dictator, is defrosted. In this movie, Kirk finds a son and Spock sacrifices his life for the ship. All the flavor of the original series is recaptured and fans loved it. But, one has to wonder how Ricardo Montalban ever landed on that tropical isle.

Star Trek III: The Search for Spock (1984) did its best to follow in the wake of the number two blockbuster. The film returned Kirk and crew to planet Genesis where the non- quite-dead Spock is reborn. Yet, with rebirth comes death and Kirk loses his son just as Sarek finds his and Genesis implodes.

Star Trek: The Voyage Home (1986) helps redeem the mess Search left behind with a time travel plot, a hijacked Bird of Prey, a mysterious probe and of course, whales. Star Trek V: The Final Frontier (1989) had writers once again searched long and hard to come up with another daisy of a script. Somehow a group of people searching for a mutual god makes a weak plot and a stupid movie.

The success of Star Trek VI The Undiscovered Country (1991) is just as sweet as the movie that ended the triumphant journey of the Enterprise's crew. The cast got back its chemistry and dignity with a teary, "bonding" ending between Kirk, Spock and Bones.

Paramount didn't skip a beat once they saw they had something. Like a good corporate studio they gobbled up all rights to "Star Trek," making it a company trademark and later creating the United/Paramount network around the franchise's success. Even Captain Picard's signature tugging of the old uniform is Paramount property.

"Star Trek"'s popularity stretches to literature as well. According to Entertainment Weekly, 13 "Trek" books are sold every minute in the US, with two "Trek" novels coming out every month. Technical manuals (Mr. Scott's Guide to the Enterprise), compendiums (The "Star Trek" Next Generation" Companion), references (All I Need to Know I Learned From Watching "Star Trek") and dictionaries (The Klingon Dictionary) have also been published.

Although it may seem odd now, the 1987 creation of "Star Trek: The Next Generation" was a gamble. Who could live up to the legacy of Kirk and Spock? How could the idea continue? There were only some of the questions die hard fans were asking.

But, the series did air despite skeptical viewers and most of it's success was due to the ingenious writers who drew upon Roddenberry's dream. They decided not to change the show, but to improve upon old ideas. The series was set 100 years after Kirk and company roamed the galaxy in the 24th century.

Captain Jean-Luc Picard, a cooler but no less magnetic character took the captain's chair. Beverly Crusher became the Chief Medical Officer; Geordi LaForge, a blind Afro- American, took up Chief Engineer; Data, an emotionless android and Worf, a Klingon, helped provide security. William T. Riker, became the dashing First Officer and Deanna Troi counseled the crew and rounded off the face of a new generation.

People and Pop Culture in the News

With the passing of Halloween, one knows that the Holiday Season isn't far off (some stores have pseudo-trees in August — already decorated!). So, if your stumped for gifts why not consider the melodious sounds from the new "Baywatch" album? That's right, "Baywatch" isn't going to be outdone by those other California shows. This great sounding CD features groovy tunes sung by super lifeguard David Hasselhoff and Laura Branigan ...remember her? His warbling will be sure to clear up the question about his starring in Les Mis. I wonder if Kit is available for a duet.

The Material Girl has a new beau. Carlos Leon, a twenty-something Cuban-born cyclist met Madonna in Central Park during her frequent jogs. She approached the youngster to compliment him on his sunglasses. Come on! Sunglasses, how about something more obvious — like his bike or Speedos.

Love must be in the air because both Holly Hunter and Roseanne have caught the engagement fever. Hunter is hooking up for the first time with Oscar winning Schindler's List–cinematographer Janusz Kaminski. Roseanne is walking up the aisle again with Ben Johnson, her 28–year– old bodyguard. The two will celebrate both Roseanne's divorce and wedded bliss back–to–back.

Wonder what Elvira, Mistress of the Dark does during the off–season? Would you believe starting a family? Actress Cassandra Peterson recently delivered her first child, Sadie Leigh on Oct. 12. The Mistress of Darkness was aiming for a Halloween birth. Exactly how would her beer commercial spots handle a pregnant sex goddess . . . "Hello everyone, it's me, a slightly pregnant but just as alluring Mistress of the Dark." It just doesn't have the same kick.

George Lucas denied rumors that Kenneth Branagh will play Obi–wan Kenobi in his next Star Wars film. In fact, Lucas never met or talked to the director of the upcoming Frankenstein. Tonya Harding will get a chance to grace the silver screen. She is hard at work on her set of her debuting film, Breakaway. Harding will receive $10,00 for two days' work — a steal in terms of Hollywood wages. Premiere magazine did an article on the film and featured several "action" scene photos of Harding. The cut line read, "Note: No rival skaters were harmed in the making of this film." Ouch.

Anna Nicole Smith is waltzing into court with a lawsuit against New York magazine. Apparently she is suing them because they put a picture of her (in cutoffs and a halter top, crouched down by some junk food) in an article entitled, "White Trash Nation." Gee I wonder why they did that? Anyway, she is suing because she claims it damages her image.

Material in the article was taken from wire services and other publications.

Books Anno Dracula

With the popularity of vampires growing, it seems that Dracula books are a dime a dozen. As an avid reader of vampire novels (fiction and non–fiction), and a faithful Anne Rice follower, I was pleased to find a book that stands up to the flare of Bram Stoker and company.

Anno Dracula by authoress Kim Newman reverts back to the days of Stoker's infamous count. Her story takes off on a different note and includes the real Vlad Tepes. The Prince Dracula kills Harker and makes Mina a vampire. He then sets out to turn all of England into the undead by marrying the widowed Queen Victoria and becoming the prince Consort.

This is all with the knowledge of the good people in England. This book is unique because it explores a world split between the undead and the living, existing in a time of poverty where small children are sold for blood and prostitutes likewise. It gives insight to the oppressive nature of vampirism and how foolish people can be when offered immortality.

Video That's Entertainment!

For lovers of the golden age of movies — big stars, big budgets, big musical numbers — comes the spirited and wholly exuberant That's Entertainment III, now out on video.

This third collection of classic moments from MGM grand musicals is hosted by golden age stars that include Gene Kelly, Cyd Charisse, Lena Horne, Mickey Rooney and Esther Williams. The clips feature classic stars in show stopping sequences, from Fred Astaire to Judy Garland.

The film also recovers "lost" material, including one of the numbers Garland performed for Annie Get Your Gun before she was replaced by Betty Hutton due to her nervous breakdown, and two contrasting versions of "Two–Faced Woman;" one sung by Cyd Charisse that was later cut and one performed (horribly) by Joan Crawford that was used. (Ironically, both use the same dubbed voice.)

That's Entertainment III certainly lives up to its name and proves that — unfortunately — they don't make 'em like they used to.

— Jon Lupo

Print Rolling Stone

A new Rolling Stone has hit the shelves and it's a collector's edition entitled Generation Next (clever). The issue is a collection of 74 pictures of artists who the magazine feels are the future of music.

Such artists as Perry Farrell, Trent Reznor, the Chili Peppers and Tori Amos have full page spreads. The usually conservative magazine actually makes some not–so– conservative choices, as they also feature American Music Club, Afghan Whigs, Sugar and Bjork. Some of the choices for full page features, as opposed to a three by five on a page of three do seem a little off kilter however. Spin Doctors and Babes in Toyland get a full page while Soundgarden, Sonic Youth and Alice in Chains get an index card size photo . . . hmmmm.

Regardless, Rolling Stone has always been great for weird and disturbing photos, and this issue is no exception (check out the Meat Puppets and Perry Farrell photos). With 74 options, there is bound to be something that yanks your musical chain.

Student run radio station strives to be 'listening alternative'

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Being a student run organization in never easy. Being a student run radio station trying to attract listeners while remaining cutting edge at the same time is even harder. But for years WAMH, Amherst College Radio, has been trying to accomplish both. And while they have successfully managed to create some of the most interesting programming around, they have only been rewarded with some hip status and a healthy dose of anonymity.

So what exactly does it mean to be a college radio station determined to walk a different path than the mainstream. Well, in a lot of cases it means getting to say "I told you so," and experiencing a general lack of appreciation.

"I think a lot of people are like 'Oh, WAMH they play freaky music that I don't like. They don't play Pearl Jam,'" says Megan Brown, the station's general manager, Brown has been the GM since last January and is the first female to hold the position in the station's history.

"It's tough work," Brown said, commenting on being a student run organization. "We're constantly not only having technical problems, but we also have these ideological conflicts as well."

The word alternative's meaning has become steadily more hazy as the '90s have progressed, thanks in part to MTV and the slow dissolution of the music underground, it is inevitable that such conflicts would arise.

"The world of college rock is changing a lot. MTV is jumping on the bandwagon and you've got to ask yourself what is alternative and what is not," says Brown.

"The whole point of the station is to provide a listening alternative for the community. That is what it says in our constitution. So what does that mean? It's like trying to figure out if Green Day is a listening alternative? Is R.E.M. a listening alternative? I think not."

Star Trek

After a shaky start, much like the original show had, "ST:TNG" soon warped into popularity. A sleek new Enterprise, better technology, more special effects, new species of aliens and a creature named Q (named after a friend of Roddenberry's) helped boost the show to the top of the ratings.

Of course the question of the day was who was the better captain? Picard or Kirk? Many argue that Kirk was the more brash and dashing captain. He was young, full of life and impulsive even in his later years. Plus he was the only cadet to beat the famed Kobayashi Maru scenario.

On the other hand, Picard is calmer, cooler and more collect. His love for space is heightened by his love for all things intellectual. And although he has only gotten lucky (twice in seven years (versus Kirk's umpteen conquests) he still has sex appeal. Plus, he was the only freshman at the Academy to win the Starfleet Academy Marathon on Danula II and he invented the famous Picard Maneuver while on board the Stargazer's encounter with the Ferengi.

In the upcoming Generations film, Trekkies will get the chance to see the two combine the best of both captains despite their rumored on set differences.

The question is, will it be enough to launch Generations into the "Trek" legend category? Several things were iffy about the film from the start. Both Marina Sirtis and Brent Spiner weren't going to sign on because their parts were so small. After wrapping up the film, it was decided that the set was unacceptable and the whole thing was rebuilt and reshot moving the opening to a later date.

Can an emotion chip for Data, the return of Q and the reunion of Picard and Kirk create another winner? One can only speculate. But in the meantime, "Trek" fans can still turn to the television for more Star Trek adventure.

Last year, "ST:TNG" spawned a spin–off, "Deep Space Nine." This show put actors like Avery Brooks onto a space station outside a worm hole. One could argue that "DSN" was created in anticipation of the "Next Generation"'s end because it debuted during the shows seventh (and rumored) final season. Many Treks still deliberated over "DSN's" ability to fill "ST:TNG" space. But just when we thought we had all the answers, Paramount pulls another phaser out of it's pocket and creates the upcoming "Star Trek: Voyager."

Set in the same time period as "DSN" and "ST:TNG," the series opens with the USS Voyager being flung into the outer reaches of the galaxy. Here they will be forced to team up with a band of freedom fighters known as the Maquis.

Captain Kathryn Janeway takes the bridge with a Native American First officer, an African–American Vulcan Security Officer and a Klingon/human female Chief Engineer. Also on board are Neelix, a guide, cook and handy man (also a new species of alien), a Chinese– American Ops/Communications Officer and Kes, an Ocampa with a life span of nine years.

The success of this show will ride on the acceptance of the viewers. Cast members are already being embraced by the "Trek" community and asked to speak at several conventions.

Rest assured though, Trekkies can live long and prosper as "Star Trek" continues to boldly go as long as vivid imaginations and the ability to dream exists.

Wanda waited night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had seduced the man in the yellow hat and consumed the Prince of Malawi's fame, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's fame careened into the trunk of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with

Three new Trek books carry on bold adventure

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

There are three new hardcover books, hot off the presses which have been published in order to catch the wave Star Trek: Generations has created. George Takei (Mr. Sulu) has written a smashing autobiography and Nichelle Nichols (Uhura) explores her feelings and emotions in a memoir. Also, co–authors Judith and Garfield Reeves–Stevens, have gone the way of fiction with the epic story about the creation of the "Star Trek" Federation of Planets.

TO THE STARS
The Autobiography of George Takei, "Star Trek"'s Mr Sulu
George Takei
Pocket Books

George Takei talks about his life before, after and during his years as Mr. Sulu, helmsman of the Starship Enterprise and as the Captain of the Starship Excelsior.

COURTESY KELLY CAMPBELL
Actor & author George Takei

The book divulges into Takei's early childhood at a "relocation camp" in Arkansas during WWII and his move to Los Angeles after the war. He reminisces about his early years on the L.A. City Council and how he helped create the L.A. subway system.

Eventually, he writes about his first meeting with Gene Roddenberry, the show's creator. Takei also gives insight to the relationships the cast had with each other, wrenching rivalries and stellar achievements. He explores what it was like being an Asian–American on television during the Vietnam War and the pressures he felt.

BEYOND UHURA: "STAR TREK" AND OTHER MEMORIES
Nichelle Nichols
G.P. Putnam's Sons

Nichelle Nichols' character, Uhura was often seen seated behind a round screen relaying messages to Starfleet and trying to hail alien vessels. As a woman in the 1960s, she did many things members of her sex were still fighting for. She was a Communications Officer aboard the flag Starship Enterprise and participated in the first interracial kiss in the history of television with Captain Kirk. Plus, she was able to get to know, personally, "Trek" creator Gene Roddenberry, allowing us to see an intimate side otherwise unknown.

In her book she recounts how she and Roddenberry kept their romance private.

"Gene could catch you up in his dreams. Before long — and despite our respective circumstances — we fell in love. Contrary to what some people now claim, our romance remained a secret for decades," writes Nichols.

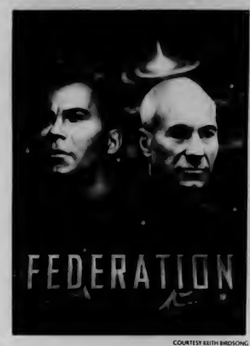
"It came to be fairly well–known in "Trek" circles only in the last years of Gene's life. Until then, both he and I, out of respect for each other and the important people in our lives, were highly discreet. Our relationship was over long before "Star Trek," and few knew we had ever met before."

The book goes on to explain her relationship with Roddenberry and the heartache she felt when he wed Majel Barrett (Nurse Chapel and the voice of the computer on the original show). She tells how torn she was and how she had to move on with her life and her career; revealing herself as a strong woman with a passionate heart and emotions.

STAR TREK: FEDERATION
Judith & Garfield Reeves–Stevens
Pocket Books

This novel unties the crews of both Starship Enterprises in an epic adventure that spans time and space. The plot is based on Picard's and Kirk's run–in with Zenfram Cochrane, the creator of the warp core engine and the reason why the Federation of Planets exists.

The book begins with Kirk confronting the Guardian of Forever (also mentioned in Imazadi), seeking some explanation for his existence and purpose in life. He is shown in the span of a few seconds thousands of years of history, and most importantly, the life of Cochrane.



COURTESY KEITH BIRDSONG
Star Trek: Federation, a new novel by Judith & Garfield Reeves–Stevens

In the book, Pre–WWIII Earth was a time of dictatorship and oppression. Cochrane's invention allowed humans to escape Earth leaving behind its failing economical and political systems. These people are later on seen as traitors to Earth and one mad man immortalizes himself to see Cochrane pay for this.

As Cochrane flees the madman and find solace with the Guardian, a spiritual being who stops Cochrane from aging, the time frame shifts to the future.

Here Picard obtains a supposed piece of Borg ship which could help the Federation protect itself from attacks. Inside he finds an object that looks like a Preserver artifact. It is in trying to unlock the artifacts secrets that two time dimensions cross in a web of evil, resulting in the resurrection of a mad man.

Reeves–Stevens do this masterfully, keeping the reader unconfused through the different time dimensions. They are also authors of the "Star Trek" books Memory Prime and Prime Directive.

Joe Pesci featured in 'Jimmy Hollywood,'

JIMMY HOLLYWOOD
(Paramount. Priced for rental market. Rated R)

Among America's enduring fantasies, the Hollywood dream is undying. Ever since images first flickered on the big screen, kids with stars in their eyes have packed up and headed for movieland to hit it big.

We all know at least one — the class clown, the girl with the big voice, the guy with a little talent and a lot of moxie — guys like Jimmy Hollywood.

Actually, his name is Jimmy Alto, and Joe Pesci, who gives him life on screen, knows him well. Jimmy is every actor's nightmare of what he might become — a would-be star who takes ads on park benches and waits for the casting directors to call.

Barry Levinson, who wrote and directed Jimmy Hollywood, also knows Jimmy and the genre of the Hollywood movie. And if this isn't the usual rags-to-riches "A Star Is Born" story, it may have a more important message. Levinson takes the story of the movie world out into the streets of the real Hollywood — a gritty, crime-ridden place littered with the refuse of past glories.

There is regret and disappointment here synthesized in Jimmy's cry: "What have they done to my Hollywood?" If Jimmy Hollywood doesn't have the anger of "Day of the Locusts," it's because Levinson loves the place — and guys like Jimmy — too much to assassinate them.

Pesci, in shoulder-length blond hair, driving a big old car that belches fumes at every stop, dreams of a different Hollywood. "I wish I could have taken you dancing at Ciro's," Jimmy tells his hairdresser girlfriend (Victoria Abril).

It is a deep longing for a Hollywood of the past — or perhaps one that never existed — that gives Jimmy Hollywood its poignant soul.

When Jimmy watches old black-and-white documentaries on Hollywood's golden era, the nostalgia is tinged with reality. Even then, they were talking about unfulfilled dreams of aspiring stars. When we meet Jimmy, his dreams are beginning to die. He can't seem to get a role in anything. He walks the streets of Hollywood, counting stars on the pavement and living on hope. When his big chance falls through, Jimmy teeters at the edge. Then his car radio is stolen and that's the last straw.

With his friend, William (a touchingly dim Christian Slater), aiding and abetting, Jimmy decides to take on Hollywood's criminal element. He becomes a video vigilante — a terrorist on the side of right, if you will. There's a lot of pop culture tied up in his methodology and the power of TV is only part of it.

ASSOCIATED PRESS
Christian Slater co–stars in Jimmy Hollywood with Joe Pesci and Victoria Abril. The Barry Levinson–directed comedy is now out on video.

There are some slack areas in the script, but for anyone who has walked the tawdry streets of Hollywood, the adventures of Jimmy and William trying to fight crime amid the glitter will touch a nerve. Although this may be a fable, it has the ring of truth. It could happen here.

Be forewarned: Jimmy Hollywood is not a rollicking comedy. It's a movie with a lot of smiles but few guffaws. But don't start rewinding the video before the credits roll. The funniest scenes of the movie involve a postscript with an uncredited cameo by Harrison Ford.

In the end, they leave you laughing. (Linda Deutsch)

WITH HONORS
(Warner. Priced for rental market. Rated PG-13)

It's a sure-fire film formula: A free-spirited stranger suddenly appears among a clutch of uptight individuals, transforms their lives with his forceful personality, then moves on.

It has worked from Picnic to Down and Out in Beverly Hills to The Fisher King. But seldom has it been employed more engagingly than in With Honors.

The comedy-drama is tailor-made for Joe Pesci. He's the tattered, bearded, scruffy Simon Wilder, who prides himself on being a bum, not a homeless person. A bum, he explains, is someone who has dropped out of society of his own free will, not economic hardship.

Simon makes a habit of hanging around university campuses. He holes up in the boiler room of Harvard's Widener Library.

Student Brendan Fraser slips on ice and loses the only copy of his doctoral thesis down a library grate. Simon holds the manuscript hostage, demanding food and favors for each page.

Simon gradually enters the lives of four house-sharing students: Fraser, a scholar under the thumb of a reactionary professor; Moira Kelly, a bright, competitive student; Patrick Dempsey, a bearded throwback to the anarchic '60s; and Josh Hamilton, a nervous, prissy med student.

The comedy arises from Simon's noisy challenge to the absurdities of the world around him; he even appears in class and puts down the overbearing professor (Gore Vidal in a splendid takeoff of John Houseman).

But the tone turns somber as Simon's health deteriorates and the students lose their fear and contempt of him. (Bob Thomas)

Jonathan Richman to amuse with groovy tunes

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

Anyone fortunate enough to be in attendance tonight when Jonathan Richman takes the stage at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton should be ready for an unforgettable performance from one of the true legends of rock and roll.

For over 20 years, Boston native Richman has been writing and performing his own unique brand of understated folk/blues/rock to devoted fans all over the world.

Now the singer/songwriter responsible for such timeless rock classics as "Pablo Picasso" and "Roadrunner" will be returning to his home state to do what he likes to do best: perform his songs live in an intimate setting.

Richman began his musical career in the early 1970s as a founding member of the pseudo-supergroup The Modern Lovers. The band combined dark, Velvet Underground– inspired music with some of the funniest, most juvenile lyrics ever penned.

After playing together for just a few short years and recording some of the most highly influential music of the decade, The Modern Lovers broke up and Jonathan struck out to make a go of it on his own.

In the nearly two decades since then, Richman has teamed up with countless musicians and backing bands but, with the release of his most recent album and subsequent tour, he has finally returned to the stripped-down guitar and vocals format that he has always preferred.

"The way I sing and play is so erratic and spontaneous," Richman said. "I'm forever adding verses, changing verses, changing keys, that I'd say I communicate with an audience better this way."

Richman's wit is casual and frequently self-deprecating, as when he parodies The Modern Lovers' "She's Cracked" during "Monologue About Bermuda." His peculiar genius lies in his ability to combine simple, even childish, humor with a profoundly sincere sense of sentimentality, often within the same song.

To call Richman's instrumentation minimalist is an understatement. Few other performers can convey so much with the use of so little. In fact, he has been known to stop playing his guitar in mid–song and continue with only his voice so as to prevent anything from coming between him and his audience.

When he first began singing professionally at the age of 18, Richman made himself a promise. "I promised myself that if it ever became work instead of fun, I'd quit that day," he said. "And if it ever does, I will."

It is the ability to convey this same enthusiasm to his audience that makes Richman such an amazing performer and one of his shows so much fun.

Jonathan Richman will be performing at 7 p.m. tonight at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. Tickets are $12.50 and are available at the Northampton Box Office and the Iron Horse. For more information call 586–8686 or 1–800–THE TICK.

dition of the "Three's Company" theme to a donkey that was brought home (don't even ask me how) by those mischievous little Olsen twins. I guess the girls were getting bored with just taking in stray cats. Anyway, this program had nothing whatsoever to do with Halloween, but it sure was frightening to watch.

Even creepier is the fact that "Full House" has prospered on the air for seven years, which is longer than the broadcast histories of "Moonlighting" and "I'll Fly Away" combined. Sometimes I think that there really must be zombies watching television among us.

By the way, I'm proud to announce that I am now a part of the latest youth–market craze and inspiration for thousands of popular Halloween costumes: yes, I've finally seen "The Mighty Morphin Power Rangers." The thing with the Power Rangers (for you deprived and totally out of it viewers) is that they're normal middle–school students at the same time that they're also pre–teen super heroes with hearts of gold and really cool–looking power suits.

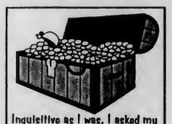
The way I see it, the Power Rangers function as a kind of diversion for 12 and 13–year–olds . . . to help them forget their raging hormones and the hell of junior high school, I guess. The show is essentially a younger, slicker version of "Kung Fu," with more colorful outfits.

But at least now I know that when somebody talks about "Power Rangers," that they're not referring to some strange underground vigilante organization, or the newest battery–operated Tonka truck.

And, finally, in honor of the Halloween season, I am pleased to announce the recipients of my annual awards for the scariest T.V. spectacles of the fall season. In the best actor category, Mitt Romney wins easily for his convincing portrayal of a Ken doll, during the senatorial debates. You really freaked me out, Mitt, and I figured you were entitled to win something for your exceedingly creepy campaign efforts. Just don't plan too many more victory parties, if you know what I mean.

But the show that receives my special citation for being perhaps the most gruesome October programming of them all, is none other than NBC's world premiere broadcast of the made–for–TV movie "Roseanne and Tom: Behind the Scenes." All I can say is, that it gave a whole new meaning to the word horror, and I left my television frazzled after this two hour scream–fest (hey, that sounds like a promo!)

Tracy Gavel is a Collegian correspondent.



Inquisitive as I was, I asked my professor, "What is another name for pirate treasure?" He replied, "Why that would be 'booty', yes, that's what it is." MASS DAILY COLLEGIAN Shake it, shake it, shake it!

With two new films & a nervous smile, John Cusack hits it big

By Hillel Italie
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Ask John Cusack something he doesn't want to answer and he's likely to smile nervously and wait for another question.

That happened recently when he was asked during an interview whether he thought it possible to find a more tactful way to express himself with writers and directors.

Nervous smile.

Well?

"I have to get better at that, definitely."

He won't name any movies, but you can guess they include Class or Sixteen Candles or One Crazy Summer. It also may explain why he's turned down parts in such commercial successes as White Men Can't Jump, Indecent Proposal and Sleeping With the Enemy.

"You have a clear view of what you think you are, what you feel you want, what you feel is right, what you feel you have to do. I don't like playing characters who are empty vessels," said Cusack, 28, a Los Angeles resident staying in a Manhattan high-rise apartment while he films the political thriller Guy Hall.

"A lot of the time the writers and the actors vie for possession of the character's soul, and it's a very political process and there's always a strange process," he said. "It's undefined on how far you push it before you destroy the relationship with the people you're working with."

In person, the sleepy-eyed Cusack comes across as a wary, no-frills guy who doesn't buy into the hype, who only became an actor because he couldn't hit a curveball or play in a rock 'n' roll band, the kind of guy who scowls at the very idea of wearing a tie.

This may explain his appearance for the interview: jeans, flannel shirt conspicuously untucked, face conspicuously unshaven. When he answers the door, you wonder if he even remembered he was supposed to meet with a reporter.

But Cusack is known for missing nothing when it comes to his characters, and he shows the same kind of determination on screen. He plays fast-talkers who know what they want, be it a girl (The Sure Thing, Say Anything), or money (The Grifters, The Road to Wellville) or political power (True Colors).

In Woody Allen's Bullets Over Broadway, Cusack's character is in it for the art. He stars as David Shayne, a high-minded 1920s playwright whose ideals are tested when a mobster puts up the money and insists on a part for his untalented girlfriend.

Whining and fretting about morality, Shayne is a classic Allen alter ego, a neurotic intellectual the director himself might have played 20 years ago.

Any words with the Woodman over the soul of this character? "He doesn't count at all," said Cusack, sitting down at a small dining table and lighting up a cigarette. "That's the dream gig. Woody? The rest of the world doesn't apply to Woody. A lot of the great directors, that doesn't apply to, either.

"Woody doesn't care what you say. He doesn't even know what's on the page a lot of the time. He's the best writer to ever work with, and he literally doesn't even notice the particular words while he's watching you rehearse," said the actor, who also appeared in Allen's Shadows and Fog.

"There are times I'd be doing the lines. He would come up very often and say, 'Improvise. Step on each other, and if you don't like the lines, say what you like, so it sounds like two people talking.' I'd say, 'Woody, the scene's so great. I want to hit all the beats.' He'd say, 'Trust me, it's not that good.'"

> "There are times I'd be doing the lines. [Woody Allen] would come up very often and say, 'Improvise. Step on each other, and if you don't like the lines, say what you like, so it sounds like two people talking.' I'd say, 'Woody, the scene's so great. I want to hit all the beats.' He'd say, 'Trust me, it's not that good.'"
> — John Cusack

Cusack, the son of documentary filmmaker Richard Cusack and brother of actress Joan Cusack, grew up in Chicago and was in grade school when he began acting in local theater.

He was just another teen film actor at first, with small roles in Sixteen Candles and Class, but he earned critical respect with The Sure Thing and Say Anything and he moved on to adult roles with The Grifters.

Like his friend and occasional co-star, Tim Robbins, Cusack has a social conscience. He's concerned about selling out, determined to make films that don't conflict with how he sees the world.

"I think films make far more of a difference than most of the bills that are passed. They affect mass culture on a huge level," said Cusack, who is working on his own project, Grosse Point Blank, a dark comedy he co-wrote and plans on producing.

Still, if he wants to keep living well (he has a beachfront house in Malibu), compromise may be in order. That could mean being a little easier on directors and screenwriters. It could also mean being just as open-minded about interviews.

"I'm getting a lot of pressure (to do interviews). . . . With this movie (Bullets), I'm getting a full-court press. They want me to do 'Letterman.' I don't want to do that, although I like the show," Cusack said.

"I was thinking about going on with a film of Rex Reed and Dixie Whatley arguing whether I was cute. They didn't say anything, they just argued. 'He's a moron.' 'He's cute.' 'He's a moron.' 'He's cute.' 'Cute.' 'Moron.' 'Cute.' 'Moron.' We'll let the audience decide."

Helium, Polvo to play Bluewall

COURTESY JENNIFER KHALA

Helium are set to play the Bluewall on Friday evening.

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

The fact that the band Helium took their name from one of the lightest gaseous elements known may be a bit misleading, but then again this Boston based band probably intended it that way. Helium's music is far from anything remotely "light." The band will play on Nov. 4 in the Bluewall Cafe, in a show sponsored by UPC.

Already there is a huge buzz swarming around the band's relatively small output of mesmerizing, dark and scraping songs. The band seems poised on the verge of emerging out of their shadow of obscurity.

Forming in Boston after singer/guitarist Mary Timony left her previous band Autoclave (whose 10" release is currently available on Dischord Records) and joined up with bassist Brian Dunton and drummer Shaun King Devlin, Helium soon released their first single "American Jean" on their own Rare Warped Records (nice pun).

The single was the first glimpse into Timony's jarring songwriting technique which carefully blends delicate vocals laced with sometimes harsh, even discordant, musicianship.

In fact the most startling aspect of Helium may come from Timony's lyrics themselves. Delivered in her girl next door voice, Timony spits out vengeful verse that is almost sneaks up on you before it stings.

"I want to somehow do something to improve the status of being a woman. Right now, I'm trying to figure out how to do that, and if the songs have an underlying theme, that's it," Timony told Alternative Press.

Since their debut single the band has recorded a single for the Pop Narcotic label ("Hole In The Ground"), as well as released a seven-track EP entitled Pirate Prude on Matador Records.

With a new single and full-length album slated for release in the near future, Helium may be a name that you may here more in the future.

Also playing is Chapel Hill, N.C.'s Polvo, who have made their mark in the underground world thanks in part to their tortured guitar experiments.

Taking any preconceived notions of song structure and tossing them out the window, Polvo have been breaking rules since their first release, the "Can I Ride" double 7" released in 1991. Since then the band has released two more singles as well as two full-length albums, Cor-Crane Secret and Today's Active Lifestyles on Merge Records.

"Yesterday I was lounging around with my friends trying decide how to start off this year's Homecoming Weekend when I heard from the boy next door that The Mass Daily Collegian was having their Fall Open House on Friday! Needless to say I immediately grabbed my daily planner and penciled them in from 12 - 4. The thought of being able to see firsthand how the largest college daily operates was breathtaking! I also hoped that I would run into some of the cool people who write the cool stuff for my favorite paper. My friends and I sat in delight at the prospect of our Friday afternoon. What a glorious day it would be. I would have to tell my other friends about it because they would be jealous if I went and they didn't. And just think - it was all because of the boy next door."

Inquisitive as I was, I asked my professor, "What is another name for plushy heavens?" He replied, "Why that would be 'heavy', yes, that's what it is." MASS DAILY COLLEGIAN Books it, stacks it, stores it!

'Unplugged' a worthy epitaph for Cobain

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

MTV UNPLUGGED IN NEW YORK
Nirvana
DGC Records

"This is off our first record. Most people don't own it," mumbles Kurt Cobain before strumming the opening the chords to "About A Girl."

This small bite of sarcasm is what opens Nirvana's latest release MTV Unplugged In New York, and discreetly sets the tone throughout the 53 minutes and 14 songs presented.

Already in the brief time that it have existed, MTV Unplugged releases have sustained a reputation of being tepid affairs used to boost the careers of artistically dying musicians (i.e. Eric Clapton, Rod Stewart). These programs basically featured the artist performing watered-down renditions of their "hits," complete with back-up singers and full piece bands. Unplugged? I don't think so.

So when Nirvana, America's bright and shining hope of mainstream authenticity decided to appear on the program, it was natural that die-hard fans were squirming a bit in their chair.

Well, thanks in part to MTV's tendency to replay their programming over and over until the viewer practically feels as if they are being beaten over the head, we all know the outcome. Nirvana, led by Cobain, delicately shambled through 14 tracks, some originals and some covers with no pomp or pretension, revealing a deeper, more rootsy side to their music.

Now in the wake of Kurt Cobain's death, the whole affair has been captured and released on album, giving what would of been a sort of "greatest hits" package a whole new sense.

Although all of Nirvana, plus an extra guitarist and cello player, play throughout the album, the spotlight belongs entirely to Cobain. Throughout the album he casually chats with the crowd but one can not help but feel an eerie sense of dissociation between performer and audience. It almost seems if Cobain was embarrassed by the cheesy audience applause that without fail rises before each of the easily recognizable numbers.

While the acoustic renditions of songs such as "All Apologies" and "Come As You Are" geveal a previously unseen intensity due in part to Cobain's starkly raw vocals, it is the tracks that band selected as covers that are far and away the most interesting.

Cobain manages to take the goofy bubble-gum pop of The Vaselines' "Jesus Doesn't Want Me For A Sunbeam" and the space rock of David Bowie's "The Man Who Sold The World" and transform them into revealing and haunting confessionals. There is something about hearing Cobain's voice rising from the grave moaning "Jesus don't want me for a sunbeam/because sunbeam's aren't made to look like me," that is entirely unnerving.

Even though the album completely holds up as whole throughout, the climax comes in the final track, a cover of blues-legend Leadbelly's "Where Did You Sleep Last Night," which leaves Cobain shredding his vocal chords screaming and gasping for breath. Definitely a high point in music history.

In the end it is ironic that MTV, the very thing that raised Cobain up on a pedestal and arguably added to his downfall, would be responsible for his final musical will and testament. If nothing else Unplugged In New York is a fitting epitaph for Cobain's music, as well as his genius. Haunting and essential. A

Whether you agree or not, it is clear that it is an ongoing struggle to decidedly stay underground. Even with dee-jays constantly pushing the envelope of station policy, WAMH still manages to focus on a wide range of musical styles that are not exactly Top 40 material.

From standard indie-rock, to blues, to rap, to a show that exclusively plays Frank Sinatra, the station showcases seldom heard tunes despite the pressures put upon them by the ever changing music world.

The station already has claim to the second best transmitter sight in Massachusetts (local "all hits" mavens WHMP have the best one), and signals have been rumored to travel as far as Vermont. With all this, plus an ever- rotating music library that is always up to date, the station has the power to definitely influence the unsuspecting masses.

"I generally believe that we are the best radio station around," says Aaron Panofsky, the station's program director. "Our station really has the newest stuff out. You're not hearing the same things over and over again."

And for the most part that holds true throughout the station's day to day format. While the station does not operate on a 24 hour basis as it used to, due to the enormous amount of DJs that graduated last year.

Even with the lack of currently trained DJs available (the station does however have a flood of new interns learning the ropes) the station does manage to stick to a certain format so you basically hear the same type of music at the same time everyday.

But not to worry, there are always still plenty of surprises. The weekends are dedicated to MMP, which stands for Multicultural Music Programming. This format allows for such genres as rap, jazz and funk to make their mark on the airwaves.

"We're not mandated to play certain things by anybody," says Panofsky. "There is a lot more choice left to the DJ."

And it is exactly this fact which makes the station so interesting. Since the DJ has so much say in what goes over the air, the shows become a virtual showcase for music that will probably land itself a spot in the ever sacred "Buzz Bin" a year from now.

"I try to play almost exclusively new music that hasn't been exposed in many other areas," says senior Chandra Toby, who serves as the station's music director as well as having her own show since she was a freshman. "It's tough because college radio has been undergoing such a transformation. Five years ago it was underground. Now with the surge in alternative music it has been co-opted into the mainstream."

Even despite the common everyday problems that plague the station regularly, and the fact that it is indeed student run, WAMH still feels an obligation to the community to serve and at the same time offer exposure to new ideas and styles.

"I'm always talking about the bands that I play and the [record] labels," says Toby. "I guess I hope when someone turns on the radio they're getting a kind of tutorial."

There latest release, the seven-song Celebrate The New Dark Age EP, is probably the most diverse recording the band has done yet, mixing pop conventionalism with warped and twisted guitar parts.

Area band Meristem will open the show. The band received excellent reviews for their opening performance for the rising band Stompbox.

Helium, Polvo, and Meristem will play at the Bluewall Cafe. Doors open at 7:30 p.m. Admission is $6 for UMass students with valid ID and $8 for all others. Tickets are available a Tix Unlimited, For The Record and Strawberries.

Are you voting in next Tuesday's election? If so, how are you voting?

"Yes, because I've never voted before. I hate politics, but I'm sure as hell not conservative. So I'm going to vote liberal."

–LESLIE NIRENSTEIN
sophomore, Bachelor's Degree in Individual Concentration Springfield

"Yes, I'm voting absentee ballot because I won't be in my home town. I'm not a big Kennedy fan. I have little respect for him as a person. He has a lack of integrity and character — I just can't vote for him."

–KRISTEN BEASELY
senior, psychology
Tewksbury

"Yes, because people died for the right for me to vote, so I want to take advantage of that. I'm voting Democrat because the Reagan years scarred me, therefore I don't think I can trust another Republican."

–SHAMELE STRAUGHTER
senior, fashion design with emphasis on black culture
Roxbury

"I did an absentee ballot. I'm voting [Mario] Cuomo because recently in New York with [Rudolph] Giuliana being elected, I see things since the 80's are moving backwards and things being repressed as far as civil rights. I think Cuomo is best in interests like that."

–SHANA GITTENS
junior, comparative literature
Brooklyn, N.Y.

"Yes, because it is good for me to express my opinion. I think I'm going to vote Weld and Kennedy, a mixture of both. I'm not for an actual party, I just vote from my common knowledge of the candidates."

–MIGEL RODRIGUEZ
junior, exercise science
Amherst

"Yes, because I have the right to vote. I'm not huge in politic science, but instead of saying 'Why did this guy get in,' I at least put my two cents in. I still don't have an in-depth perspective on a candidate, so I haven't decided."

–DEREK CAMERON
senior, English
North Attleboro

"I want to. I'm concerned with some of the [ballot] questions mainly. I try to vote every time it comes around. I'm more liberal, but I am voting a mix — Kennedy and Weld."

–GREG POWER
senior, communications

"My contention was that these students didn't see anything that they haven't seen in the Union News, Boston Globe, Daily Hampshire Gazette or any other newspaper that ran across the country," Smith said.

The Union News chose not to run the article for fear of legal ramifications, but once the Globe ran the article, the Union News published Smith's story.

According to the undergraduate rights and responsibilities handbook, The Family Rights and Privacy Act states that the University cannot permit access to a student's educational records. Scott commented on students' rights to academic privacy.

"Student transcripts are private; federal regulations require the utmost confidentiality surrounding these deeply personal documents," Scott said in the memo.

"We deeply regret the shock and concern students in the class may have felt if exposed to this material, and we also deeply regret any embarrassment or loss of privacy suffered by students whose personal information was revealed."

John Johnson, a former football player and current member of the track team, whose name and GPA appeared on that list, was angered when he learned of the list's existence.

"I think it's ridiculous that anyone other than the appropriate people should be able to see that information," Johnson said. "It is interesting that besides the GPAs that it was designated African American. I don't know who would make a sheet like that."

Kyri Sparks, a student athlete in the Media Criticism class was upset that Smith revealed the academic records and made a statement by not looking at the transcripts.

"I made it known that I thought what Smith was doing was ludicrous," Sparks said. "It is a violation of students' rights. Those grades are protected by a University amendment."

Suzanne Morse, another student in the Media Criticism class shared Sparks' opinions.

"I was surprised that [Smith] showed the records, I thought it was unprofessional," said Morse, who also questioned the ethnic grouping. "It makes me wonder if they're tracking all students that way. It could definitely be determined in a bad way."

the sciences, and six times as likely to serve on the boards of Fortune 500 companies.

Other Topics to be Addressed

In addition, two other major categories of discussion will take place, according to McCaffrey. The pursuit of furthering the interests of women and minorities in the sciences will be one of the arenas of discourse.

The third series of discussions will focus on educational access for low income women, including single parents.

McCaffrey said the discourses will feature the notion of creating more opportunities and support for these women to not only have access to education, but to complete a course of higher education and move on to have successful careers.

The basis for much of the conference's discourse consists of seventeen recently completed research projects funded by the Jessie Ball duPont Fund. Projects include works from professors of institutions such as Harvard University's School of Education, the Claremont Graduate School in California, and the University of Colorado.

In addition to researchers who will read from and lecture on their projects, Secretary of Education for the Commonwealth Piedad Robertson will speak at the College's Founder's Day ceremony at the conclusion of the conference.

Though no slots remain open for attendants of the conference, more information can be obtained from the Studies in Success Conference Office of Internal Affairs, 538–2032.

tionally against the likes of Cuba, Mexico, Venezuela and Colombia. The experience left nothing but pride in competing for his country ring in his voice.

"I was excited. I was so proud to play for Puerto Rico, for my country. That's the best thing about this sport, I think, to represent your country," said Limardo. "It's so good to represent the University, but it's awesome when you play for your country."

After a call by Gonzalez in his first year of college, when Javier recommended him to come to UMass, Limardo decided to make the transition northward. What ensued was a tough first–year battle with both eligibility requirements, which forced him to sit out his freshman year, and the English language, which hurt his progress by the lack of consistent communication with his coaches and teammates. These two dilemmas tested his will, but in the long run Limardo is proud of his commitment.

"I improved myself completely coming here. Playing water polo and with classes, I'm studying and learning a new language," said Limardo. "Now, in Puerto Rico it is very important. If you're going to find a job, of any sort, you need both English and Spanish."

In his sophomore season, worries about the amount of playing time admittedly got to him. Mistakes became overemphasized in his mind because of his urge to prove himself in Coach Russ Yarworth's eyes. But with season ending stats as the team lead in goals scored [67], a .573 shooting percentage and a finith point total of 89, he was understated about his accomplishments.

Expectations for the Minutemen this season were high after last season's NCAA sixth–place finish, and first Eastern team win over a Western foe in their victory over power UC–San Diego. With this success, it brought more practice time on the part of Yarworth to reach, and pass, that level.

This was fine in the eyes of Limardo, because it would help both the team and himself. He deflected his prominent role on the squad, and emphasized the importance of distribution throughout the team in both offensive and defensive terms. Their impressive winning record this year points to that, and so does Limardo.

"I asked the question, too, if we were just an Eastern team. But after the weekend in California [Baldy View Tournament], the coach and the guys from [No. 7] Santa Barbara came to us and said that we have to play out here more, saying 'you are at a level that we are at right now'," Limardo said.

"I think we have the chance to be the best in the East again, I don't have any doubt about it. I think UMass is a lot better than any other team in the East. We're at the level of any West Coast team."

With one more year here at UMass, Limardo sees the future of water polo in an optimistic light. Even with the departure of senior co–captains Gonzalez and Adolfo Oliete, the emergence of junior field player Frankie Mariani and sophomores Greg Menton [third in team scoring with 85 points] and Ron Gonen, coupled with freshman standouts Marc Staudenbaur and brother Juan Carlos Limardo, this season spells no short fall in talent for next season.

and Lawrence Phillips enter the draft joining Wheatley and Napoleon Kaufman, this draft will be loaded with runners.

The overall talent at running back is good news for the New England Patriots, who are on course to pick in spots 5– 10. A top runner or wideout].]. Stokes [if healthy] could be there to perk up the offense.

Steve McNair continues to fluctuate in the eyes of pro scouts. Some don't like his decision–making or his completion percentage, while other are overwhelmed by his physical tools. A team that drafts in the Top 10 probably won't gamble on the I–AA star, but McNair should be selected in the middle of the first round.

A perfect fit for McNair would be teams like the New York Jets or Los Angeles Raiders, teams that have aging veteran QB's that figure to be done in one or two years. Jets GM Dick Steinberg has stated that he loves McNair's physical skills, and sees his height [under 6–foot 2–inches] as the only drawback.

On to the weekend ahead, with the season record finally up to the Corso line [9–9]. Three close conference match–ups are on the slate.

Miami 27, Syracuse 18 — The Hurricane defense will be too much for the Orange. It was supposed to be down year for 'Cuse, but now they appear to be the second best team in the Big East. The 'Canes didn't win the conference title last year for the first time and will not let that happen again

Texas A&M 25, Texas 10 — One of the greatest and most colorful rivalries in college football. Too bad we will not be able to watch the game on TV because A&M is one probation. However, the NCAA can take away bowl and TV privileges, but the talent still remains. Funny, steal the jewels, get caught and penalized, but keep the prize [it works for Auburn, too]. Aggies role behind star QB Corey Pullig.

Wisconsin 26, Ohio State 24 — The upset special of the week. The Badgers unstoppable backfield [Terrell Fletcher and Brent Moss] run all over the Buckeyes. OSU, still shell– shocked from the Penn State thrashing, are a beaten team mentally and Wisconsin is on a roll after upsetting Michigan.

with it, Dennis Rodman will continue to play his off–the–court games, and it won't bother him in the least.

And that's a shame.

• I criticized the Atlanta Hawks when they traded Dominique Wilkins to the Los Angeles Clippers for Danny Manning in the midseason while they were atop the Central Division, and I don't regret in doing so. The trade of Wilkins was ridiculous.

The Hawks managed to win the regular season, but got bounced in the first round of the playoffs by the Miami Heat. Personally, I would rather have had the playoff–experienced Wilkins in the playoffs rather than Manning, who was untested in post–season play. The only thing the Manning trade did for the Hawks in the long run was affect the team–chemistry. Why mess up what could have been the Hawks' best season with their ten–plus year star, who deserved what could have been his last shot at a ring.

Fine, they excelled for the rest of the season with Manning, but the playoffs were a different story. Manning was brought aboard to lead the team to new heights, especially in the playoffs. That turned out to be only a wish.

And Manning is now gone, having signed with the Pheonix Suns during the off–season. For the Hawks, there's no Wilkins, no Manning, and virtually no chance at the 1994–95 NBA Championship.

The team who beat Koch and the Minutemen in penalty kicks and prevented the history–making season? The Mountaineers of West Virginia.

In the 1992 tournament, Massachusetts stunned host Rutgers in the semi–finals, 2–1, to reach its first–ever A–10 final against the Mountaineers.

Goalie Mark Wolf, then a sophomore, was stellar in net for Massachusetts during the championship run in 1992 — holding the potent Rutgers attack to one goal and shutting out West Virginia, forcing the game into penalty kicks.

One standout for Massachusetts was then–sophomore back Dan Chagnon, who made the All–Tourney team by marking the leading scorers on the opposing teams. Chagnon is now the leader of the Massachusetts defensive unit as a senior.

The players who are left from the 1992 team — Wolf, Chagnon, co–captains Mike Doyle and Colin Johnson, Brad Miller, Hossein Giahi, Joel Pittman, Joe Maruca, Eric Gruber — hope to have even more success in 1994.

The winner of the A–10 will host the winner of the MAAC to decide who receives the bid to the NCAAs.

Three teams with championship aspirations — not just the A–10, but the NCAA.

ARIES (March 21–April 19): A new domestic budget will help you stretch your resources. Resist outside interference in your private affairs. Emphasize ethics and morality on the road to business success.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Abide by a decision you've reached via careful research. The advice of a knowledgeable person should be overruled. Make some changes to make up your mind about an entertainment matter. Trust your intuition.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): You could be having a hard time coping with a difficult partner or tough competitor. Follow the sound advice of those who have had valuable experience. Bargains are plentiful but require effort to locate.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Scan newspaper ads of interest. There could be an interesting job opening or money-making enterprise. A frank talk will help you avoid run-ins at place of employment. Teamwork is the key to boosting profits.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Work is often the best cure for anxiety and fretfulness. An ill-advised change in procedure could create confusion during the afternoon. Stay away from all forms of temptation. Avoid making hasty purchases.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): The pursuit of wealth has many exponents but it does not always provide happiness. Give more thought to your values. Build savings.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Fly your financial kite with assurance. Artistic acclaim comes when you act on your instincts. Business and pleasure can be successfully combined. Fortune is on your side.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Bullying tactics will not work with a loved one or key associate. Be sensitive to their needs. You should be overruled. Make some changes to make up your mind about an entertainment matter. Trust your intuition.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Careful preparation and a determination to succeed will produce wonderful career or business results. Weigh the possibilities of acquiring a valuable property or closing a profitable deal.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Heed your more prudent instincts and avoid engaging in an argument. You need to watch your belongings when in a public place. Give your creative powers the "go ahead" this afternoon. Jot down good ideas.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Handle your finances in a conservative fashion, avoiding unnecessary lending or borrowing. You cannot always depend on others to be honest. Write concise memos, saying exactly what you mean.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): You and your partner need to discuss family conflicting views and mutual projects. Something does not always provide happiness. Give more thought to your values. Build savings.

Cancelled game does not stop Senior Day

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

For the second time this year, weather has cancelled a University of Massachusetts field hockey game, as officials were unable to reschedule Tuesday's postponed game against Springfield.

School officials attempted to reschedule the game for yesterday afternoon but were unable to get referees in time for the game.

The UMass/Boston University game was also cancelled after an mutually acceptable date could not be found to finish the game that was suspended due to rain October 20.

The game, which was the Minutewomen's last regular- season home game, was also going to be Senior Day, and possibly the final regular season game ever at Totman Field.

If the bill that was proposed by Gov. William Weld passes, the Minutewomen will likely be playing their home games on a turfed Garber Field.

The lack of a game was not enough to deter the Minutewomen from honoring their seniors.

"I don't think [the seniors] feel cheated," Massachusetts Coach Megan Donnelly said. "The important thing is what the team feels about them and that's pretty evident today."

With only her parents on hand as spectators, Donnelly assumed the master of ceremonies role and talked about Danielle Borges, Colleen Duffy, Natalie Hart and Kyri Sparks to an imaginary crowd.

"These four seniors have been instrumental in carrying on the tradition of UMass field hockey, helping the Minutewomen advance to four NCAA tournaments, the 1992 Final Four, three Atlantic 10 regular season titles and two A-10 tournament titles," Donnelly said.

The underclassmen had good things to say about their graduating teammates.

CHRISTOPHER EVANS/ COLLEGIAN

Seniors Kyri Sparks, Natalie Hart, (with Coach Megan Donnelly) Danielle Borges and Colleen Duffy were honored in a "gameless" Senior Day yesterday at Totman Field.

"They're special," sophomore goalie Hilary Rose said. "Those four are certainly going to leave their mark. Each one is different and unique. They can never be replaced, but everyone's career has to come to an end sometime. I will miss them."

Instead of their regular practice, the team played an eight- on-eight scrimmage, to get them back in the mode for playing games.

This was not, however, the most anti-climactic senior day in UMass field hockey history, according to Donnelly.

"They got a better senior day than Amy [Robertson] and I got," Donnelly said. "She and I were talking about it. I think we just got the roses in the huddle and just tossed them on the bench."

Although the final regular season game at Totman was cancelled, barring an upset in the upcoming Atlantic 10 tournament, the Minutewomen will likely have a home NCAA playoff game in the first round.

"[The prospect of having another game at Totman] makes it easier," Donnelly said. "I think we will have another game."

The team will begin their postseason play this weekend when they travel to Philadelphia for the Atlantic 10 Championship. The Minutewomen enter the tournament as the top seed and will play the host team, fourth-seeded St. Joseph's on Saturday. The winner will play the victor of the Temple-Rutgers matchup on Sunday in the Tournament Championship.

Shootout rule is creating Hockey East excitement

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

Initial action is underway in the 1994-95 Hockey East season with some trends already developing.

Early on in Hockey East, the new "shootout" rule has already created some excitement and controversy. The rule states that if a conference game is tied after regulation and a five-minute overtime period, a shootout will result.

The format: coaches choose five players for each side, each with breakaway opportunities on the goaltender. The loser of the shootout gains a point in the standings, the winner gets two [in past years ties would net one point in the standings]. The game still counts as a tie in the standings, but an extra point goes to the winner.

The debate over the new rule centers on a team that features a strong defensive game, only to lose in a shootout to teams with more skilled forwards.

Two early season games have gone to shootouts, both involving Maine. The Black Bears [0-0-2] played Northeastern and Boston University [both 0-0-1] this past weekend and lost both shootouts, but did gain two points.

The only other squad to play more than one conference game is the University of Massachusetts. UMass has dropped all three games in its initial season in the conference. The Minutemen have scored seven goals while yielding 13 in losses to Massachusetts-Lowell, Providence College and Boston College.

Those three schools all stand atop the initial standings at 1-0. New Hampshire and Merrimack have yet to see their first conference action.

Providence senior captain Brady Kramer was named player of the week. Kramer collected two points, including the game winning goal in Saturday's 5-4 come-from-behind victory over UMass. Kramer now has nine points in PC four games, which includes two wins in three non-conference games.

Northeastern freshman Scott Campbell was named rookie of the week for last weekend's play. He scored the game winner in the shootout win over Maine. The center has already become a key figure on the Huskies specialty units.

Greg Bullock, UMass-Lowell's freshmen of the year last year, is tied for the conference lead in points [5] with teammate Christian Sbrocca. UMass' Rob Bonneau is tied with Bullock for the lead in goals with two apiece.

In conference play, Lowell sophomore Craig Lindsay [1.00] has the lowest goals against average as well as the best save percentage [.967]. BC's Greg Taylor is second in both categories with a 2.00 GAA and a .920 save percentage. BU senior goalie Derek Herlofsky is third [3.00] in goals against, but does have a 1.92 GAA in overall play.

In past seasons, Hockey East schools have dominated opposing conferences. The second-highest rated league in the region is the Eastern College Athletic Conference [ECAC]. Last season, Hockey East squads handled the ECAC, going 30-11-2 combined. However, this season ECAC schools have gotten the better of the match-ups [7-4], thanks to strong starts from St. Lawrence, Colgate and Clarkson.

Colgate [2-0 against Hockey East foes] looks to continue its streak Friday, traveling to Amherst to take on the Minutemen. The Red Raiders have defeated Merrimack and UMass-Lowell.

This weekend marks the biggest slate of conference games to date. Defending champ BU takes on UMass-Lowell in a home-and-home series starting Friday at BU. Merrimack hosts Providence Friday in the begin-

Warriors add Seikaly, Rodman is a distraction to San Antonio's chemistry

Andrew Bryce

• Finally, a trade that actually makes a difference with both teams involved.

Yesterday, the Golden State Warriors traded forward Billy Owens to the Miami Heat for center Rony Seikaly. The Warriors have finally acquired a talented center, and Seikaly should be a force in Golden State.

The Warriors needed a piece of the puzzle, and that piece was a natural center. Owens, as good as he is when healthy, is injury-prone. With Chris Webber [who at the moment is amidst a ridiculous holdout for...what else...more money] being able to move to his natural position of power forward, a healthy Chris Mullin [out 4-6 weeks with a knee injury] at small forward, and Seikaly at center, the frontcourt should be stronger in the upcoming season. Should.

And the backcourt? It could be the best two-punch in the league in star point-guard Tim Hardaway and two guard all-star Latrell Sprewell. The latter transformed into an NBA First-Teamer last year after just two years in the league. Add to the backcourt veteran Ricky Pierce, who came to Golden State in a draft-day trade that included the dispensing of injury-prone Sarunas Marciulionis.

In other words, the Warriors are stacked. Their main problem last year was getting the whole team together. If Golden State remains healthy, Mullin returns from his injury to true Mullinesque form, and Webber comes back from his money-grubbing holdout, look out for them come playoff time. The additions of Seikaly and Pierce are key.

Just remember, though, if is and has been the key word with the Warriors fate.

• I can remember back in 1992 when I said that Dennis Rodman should have been named to the US Olympic Team. And I,still stick by that. On a team of gun-happy players, Rodman's relentless work on the boards and his superior defense would have complimented his star teammates' talents. Of course, it didn't really matter when the Dream Team anhilated every team they went up against.

Now, I am quickly losing respect for the lunatic. The man is ruining the San Antonio Spurs with his careless and reckless attitude more than his 17-plus rebounds a game is helping. Going to practice when he feels like it, showing up for a pre-season game in the second quarter, saying he doesn't follow anybody's rules — Rodman knows he can get away with it. Fines? It's pocket change to him.

It's fear of the time-bomb that makes the Spurs put up with his unnecessary actions. Fear that he will explode in a fit of rage; fear that if he leaves, he may star for an opposing team. It's ridiculous. Imagine how the other players feel when they bust their asses on the court, and yet have to take a backseat to the lackadaisical Rodman. And he's making some 2.4 million dollars in causing this ruckus.

There's no doubt that when Rodman plays, he is one of the best there is both on the glass and on the defensive side. But the only playing Rodman seems to be doing at this point is with the heads of the Spurs management. And since he's getting away

Three A-10 teams to battle

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

SPOTLIGHT
A closer look at Massachusetts sports

Three teams. Three titles. One common goal.

This weekend, the University of Massachusetts hopes to do something that has never been done before in the history of the Atlantic 10 Conference — win three post-season championships on the same weekend.

Jim Rudy's Minutewoman soccer team, Sam Koch's Minuteman soccer team and Megan Donnelly's Minutewomen field hockey team all enter their respective tournaments seeded No. 1 and favored to become the A-10 champion.

Former Coach Pam Hixon left Massachusetts field hockey at the end of last season, Coach Megan Donnelly came in, and as far as the A-10 goes, nothing has changed. The Minutewomen, ranked sixth in the nation, are once again the favorite to win the tourney.

Two seasons ago, Temple pushed Massachusetts to the brink of elimination, before the Minutewomen stormed back and won the championship in penalty strokes.

Last year, Massachusetts romped through the A-10 tourney, beating Rutgers and Temple by a combined score of 7-0, and brought home its second A-10 title in three years.

This season, Massachusetts' chances are just as good as they have been in the past. In the semi-finals on Saturday, the Minutewomen battle host St. Joseph's at 1 p.m., while Temple and Rutgers square off in the other semi-final.

Because of their national ranking, the Minutewomen are almost assured of a bid to the NCAAs, but their seeding could only improve if they win the A-10 tourney.

Women's soccer made its A-10 debut in 1993, with Massachusetts and George Washington playing for the title. The Minutewomen won the inaugural championship, and with an 8-0-2 regular season record since the sport was added to the conference, are the clear favorites to repeat as champions.

This time, as if Massachusetts needed any other edge, the A-10 tournament will be played here in Amherst, at Richard F. Garber Field, with the semi-finals on Friday and the championship on Sunday.

The Colonials will once again challenge Massachusetts for the title as the biggest threat to the A-10 title, but the Minutewomen are hoping for more than just the conference crown. All hopes of making another run at the NCAA Final Four which the Minutewomen advanced to last season ride on receiving a bid to the NCAAs in the first place.

Winning the A-10s will be crucial for the Minutewomen and another push toward making the Big Dance.

It's deja vu all over again for the Minutemen, who face No. 4 West Virginia in the first round Friday at 4:30 p.m. The last time Massachusetts was in the post-season was 1992 when the Minutemen advanced to the championship and were one kick away from reaching the NCAAs for the first time in the program's history.

Luis Limardo plays for love of the game

By Jorma Kansanen

For the love of the game.

In the present day world of sports, this saying seems to be drifting farther and farther away from the mindset of the star and everyday player. Even recently the idea has been proposed to pay collegiate athletes for the services rendered for their distinct university. Granted, it is only in the larger moneymakers like football and basketball, but the point has been seriously thought of.

The University of Massachusetts men's water polo team has a player that shies away from the commercial aspect of the game that envelopes most publicized sport programs, and performs just for the love and self satisfaction.

That player is junior 2-meter hole man Luis Limardo, second leading goal and point-scorer for the Minutemen this season [101 goals, 39 assists for 142 points in 92 quarters). If it wasn't for the play of senior co-captain Javier Gonzalez this year, Limardo would be the man in the spotlight.

But their one-two offensive punch has placed the team as one of the best in UMass history. With their 27-6 record surpasses the previous mark of 25 In 1992, and the 22-game winning streak accomplished earlier this season, nothing less can be surmised.

The Guaynabo, Puerto Rico-native, with his younger brother and fellow teammate Juan Carlos, began his swimming career before pre-school. With the typical brother-to-brother jealousy driving him back and forth to the pool, Luis started playing water polo at age 10.

By 1987, the thirteen-year-old was a member of the Junior Puerto Rican National team and competing interna-

No clear cut winner in college football

Anthony Guido
On College Football

For those of us who love this sport, the frustration that mounts each and every year has become unbearable.

Once again the world of college football is facing a season in which no clear national champion will be crowned. Penn State and Nebraska are undefeated and untied, and will not settle it on the field.

There have been hundreds of cases made for and against a playoff system for Division I-A football. As it often is, money is the main stumbling block towards developing some sort of deciding playoff game.

The major bowls are not going away, the conferences and the bowls make too much money in the current system. The simple answer is to still involve the bowls in a playoff format.

Take the Orange, Rose, Sugar and Fiesta bowls each year and hold one back from New Year's Day. Then after the other major bowls are played, the top two teams could meet in the designated bowl the following weekend in a nighttime game that would do very well in the ratings [making a ton of money]. It would finally decide the seemingly annual controversy.

Just who is number one this year? The arguments will never be settled. Nebraska will now most likely go to the Orange Bowl undefeated. The 'Huskers got this far by stunning Colorado 24-7, stopping one of the top two offenses in the nation.

The other top offense belongs to Penn State. The Nittany Lions absolutely buried Ohio State [63-14] and have only a stingy Illinois team keeping It from an undefeated season.

Who would win on the field? We may never know. But, in the end, Nebraska should be number one. Each team has beaten one Top 10 opponent — NU over Colorado, Penn State defeated Michigan. But Nebraska will prove It on New Year's Day. Regardless, another split national title appears inevitable.

Right now, we have a split In the AP and Coaches' polls. Penn State, as likely Big 10 champ, will go to the Rose Bowl to take on the Pac-10 champion. That means a date with Oregon or Washington State. Hardly a marquee match- up, pitting No. 2 against No. 24.

That's why Nebraska should be number one at the end of the season, beating Miami in the Orange Bowl is a heck of a lot more impressive than beating Oregon.

Watch it get even more complicated if Alabama can defeat both Auburn and Florida to go undefeated. Not likely, but the Tide could make a late jump at the top spot.

As the season winds down, teams in the NFL have begun the scouting in earnest. Running backs will be a top commodity in the draft. There appears to be no Heath Shuler or Trent Differ at quarterback, bad news for the two new expension teams coming in.

Tyrone Wheatley appears to be a top-three pick, showing all the signs that he is ready to play on Sundays now. If underclassmen Rashaan Salaam

Former administrators set to return to UM

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Three administrators asked to step down from their posts last spring are now looking forward to returning to the University of Massachusetts as professors.

Two of the three will receive smaller salaries from their administrative positions, and one will receive the same amount. All three were removed from office last April in a surprise announcement from Chancellor David K. Scott.

Samuel Conti, former vice-chancellor for research and dean of the graduate school, and Glen Gordon, former provost, are planning the curriculum for their future courses while on sabbaticals which end August 31, 1995, according to University spokeswoman Karin Sherbin.

Daniel Melley, former interim vice chancellor for University relations and development will teach a course and work on special assignments for Scott starting in January.

Melley's professional improvement leave comes to an end on July 1, 1995, Sherbin said.

All three are looking at their new positions in a positive light, with benefits of a new set of duties, fewer months of work and a return to the fields they were trained for.

"I'll be able to control my own life," Conti said. "I won't have to serve at the whim of the administration."

Two former administrators will face pay cuts

The decrease in pay rates is because of the change in status at the University, from administrator to faculty. The two classifications run by different calendars, Gordon said.

Administrators generally work on a 12-month contract, while faculty are only required to work nine months. Faculty members do not have official duties through June, July and August, therefore faculty get paid less than administrators, Gordon said.

Gordon, 62, will experience the biggest salary cut out of the three — dropping from $128,191 as provost to $103,630 as a faculty member in the political science department, Sherbin said.

Conti's salary will drop from $117,703 as vice chancellor and dean to $107,002 as a faculty member in the microbiology department, Sherbin said. Conti is 63.

Melley, 61, will be the only one to retain his salary as an administrator while he teaches in the journalism department at a salary rate of $92,000, Sherbin said.

Melley will not be considered under the statutes of 9- month faculty salary, since he will still be doing administrative work for the chancellor, he said.

More interaction with students

Less time will be expected of the former administrators in their new positions and they will have more interaction with the students, they said.

While on sabbatical leave, and professional improvement leave, the former administrators are preparing the courses they aim to teach.

Gordon is preparing two courses in political science — Introduction to American Politics and the American Presidency. He said he will begin teaching in the fall.

Gordon is also busy writing a book on the prospective changes in higher education by the year 2000, he said.

Conti is currently developing a "how to" course for students who are trying to get grants. His course will be taught on an experimental basis next semester, he said.

Conti is also in the process of writing two books — one will be on the problems the University faces when dealing with federal agencies who provide support for research. The other book will look at the University's involvement in national economic development, he said.

Melley will begin teaching a course on public relations in the journalism department next semester as an adjunct professor, he said.

Melley started out at the University doing public relations work in the UMass News Office. Because of the large degree of people he knows and alumni he is in contact with, Melley will help in fund raising for development at the University when he is not busy teaching.

A faculty position is more beneficial in comparison to an administrative position because faculty members not only receive faculty sabbatical leave, but have the opportunity to be tenured. If faculty are tenured their contract can go on forever, after they have gone through the six-year probation period, Gordon said.

If an administrator is to be fired, they have to be given a good deal of notice, and it is very difficult to do. For every 33 years at the University, the administrator is entitled to one year in advance to be asked to leave, Melley said.

"I thought my appointment was for five years," said Gordon, who was asked to step down after three. "It's all over now. If the Chancellor doesn't want you, then what's the point?"

Concerns follow revealing of athletes' GPAs

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts journalism professor said he did not know transcripts of several players of the men's basketball team would be shown to his class earlier in the week.

Steve Simurda, a part-time instructor, said he asked Springfield Union News reporter Brad Smith to talk to his class about the story printed in both The Boston Globe and the Union News last month regarding several players being on academic probation.

Both the Boston Globe and the Union News printed material they received from an unnamed source which listed five players' grade point averages from the last year and also their cumulative averages.

Smith visited the journalism class Tuesday as a guest lecturer, bringing with him a packet containing transcripts of the players and a list of many black athletes' GPAs on campus. The packet was passed around the class of approximately 17 students.

"I had no idea that he was bringing it," Simurda said. "I was surprised when he pulled [the information] out. I never even looked at it."

Simurda said he did not want his class discussion to cause more embarrassment to the University, regarding the players grades being made public.

"My main concern is that a robust and thought provoking classroom debate over an important issue might inadvertently lead to further embarrassment for the University or its student athletes," Simurda said.

UMass men's basketball Coach John Calipari declined comment on the issue.

Several students and faculty have expressed concern over the racial implications of the document containing the GPAs of all the University's Black athletes.

Nancy Fitzpatrick of the Registrar's Office said that although it is unusual, it is possible to track a specific group's academic performance.

University officials said while there will be an investigation as to the ethics of the material shown in Simurda's class, the University will make no further comment because it is a "personnel matter."

Growing unrest in Gaza leads to attack on Arafat

By Karin Laub
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Islamic militants knocked off Yasser Arafat's headdress, called him a traitor and threw him out of a mosque funeral Thursday in his worst political embarrassment as head of the Palestinian government.

Enraged mourners fired guns wildly into the air as a phalanx of police guards whisked Arafat away from the chaotic service for Hani Abed, a militant leader killed by a car bomb the fundamentalists blamed on Israel.

"Arafat is a collaborator!" shouted members of the extremist Islamic jihad movement as Arafat was shoved out a back door of the Omari mosque and into the pouring rain.

The scene underscored the growing extremist opposition Arafat has faced in the Gaza Strip since Palestinian self-rule began in May.

The PLO leader is wedged between Israeli demands to crack down on Muslim fundamentalists responsible for deadly attacks on Israeli civilians, and the need to win their support for self-rule. Arafat, who had just returned from a regional economic conference in Morocco, came straight from the border to pay his respects at the funeral of Abed, 35.

Abed died Wednesday after a bomb exploded when he opened the trunk of his car. He had been detained by Palestinian police for 18 days in June on suspicion of helping plan an attack at the Erez border crossing into Israel in which two soldiers were killed. It was the first attack on Israeli soldiers after autonomy began. Islamic Jihad leader Sheikh Abdullah Shami said only Israel could do such an expert job of rigging the car bomb that killed Abed. He demanded that Palestinian police protect Islamic leaders and threatened swift retaliation.

"Our bullets will find a way to hit settlers and soldiers everywhere," Shami told reporters at a wake in Gaza City's Sheik Radwan neighborhood.

At the mosque service, militants blocked Arafat from reaching Abed's body, wrapped in a blanket on a large wooden board. His trademark black-and-white headdress was pulled off, and bodyguards then rushed Arafat out a back door.

Outside the mosque, Islamic Jihad supporters fired their weapons into the air and shouted, "Get out of here, Arafat, get out!" and "You are not our leader! We are the people and we reject you!" Islamic militant leaders met with Arafat later Thursday and apologized for the behavior of the crowd, saying they were outsiders and did not represent their movements' sentiments. But Arafat aides said the PLO chief was deeply shaken by the hostility, the worst he has encountered since coming to Gaza in July to take the reins of the autonomy government.

Sufian Abu Zaydeh, an Arafat spokesman, said the car bombing could push the Palestinians to the brink of civil war. "This is very grave. We are moving toward a Lebanonization of the Gaza Strip," he said.

Abu Zaydeh, who blamed Israel for the bombing, said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had eroded Arafat's standing by striking in PLO-ruled territory.

In a first indication of more violence, Islamic militants called off their earlier pledges not to attack Israelis in the autonomy areas, Abu Zaydeh said.

Afro-Am professor John Bracey named faculty senate secretary

Speaks of concerns, athlete education, & minorities' roles

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

Newly appointed University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate Secretary John Bracey Jr., said he would like to attract more minorities to campus and also give more academic support to athletes.

Bracey is a member of the W.E.B. Du Bois Department of Afro-American Studies. He will be replacing Javier Cevallos, formerly of the Spanish and Portuguese Department who left the secretary position after being appointed as faculty advisor to Provost Pat Crosson.

A faculty member at the University of Massachusetts since 1972, Bracey has been an active member of the Faculty Senate while serving on the Faculty Club Committee, the Program and Budget Council as well as the UMass Press Committee.

Bracey is co-editor of several books, including Black Nationalism in America, and has written several articles on various aspects of African American experience. Bracey was also the first speaker in the University's distinguished faculty lecture series.

"He has been an active member of campus activities and one of the leaders over the years," said Paul Shuldiner, spokesman for the Faculty Senate search committee said. "His experience is deep with faculty unions and other aspects of faculty governments."

Search committee members, appointed by Chancellor David K. Scott, identify potential candidates for positions within the Faculty Senate, Shuldiner said.

"We had a number of other strong candidates who were unable or unwilling to be considered," Shuldiner said.

Working towards the future

Bracey said he is entering the position of Faculty Senate secretary at a time when several administrative proposals are being made for the future at the University.

"It is important for the Faculty Senate to be involved in planning efforts," Bracey said. "The (Faculty) Senate as a body is going to be key."

According to Bracey, he would like to see the Faculty Senate body take part in working on the equal distribution of funding between the University's professional schools such as the School of Engineering and the Liberal Arts Schools.

"The University needs to take into account both kinds of needs," Bracey said.

Meeting athlete's educational needs

Attention must also be given by the Faculty Senate in reaching the educational needs of the University's athletes, said Bracey.

"It is important that we as faculty be involved in a framework by which athletes get the best possible education in exchange for the good they bring to the University," Bracey said.

One of the first steps in implementing this task will to bring advisers from the sports department to meet with Faculty Senate and discuss the needs of the Universities athletes.

Increasing minority representation

Bracey said increasing the numbers of minorities on the University is essential to the success of the University and the Faculty Senate must work to create programs attracting minorities to the campus.

"The University is dragging its feet on the number and the scope of minority population on campus," Bracey said.

"If we don't begin to make the University a place where minorities feel welcome, they will go to other schools."

At the present time, there are less than 100 Native Americans on campus and few faculty and staff members of this ethnicity.

According to Bracey, the University must take stronger measures to increase the minority status or else the campus will eventually evolve into an all White campus with

Chiapas rebellion includes women in guerilla roles

By Michelle Lugo

"I would like to keep talking about my life but I don't have much time left and I have to conserve what I have, that is, unless they take it away from me," said Isabel Juarez Espinosa, organizer of Sna Jtz'ibejom or the Writers House, a political theater group formed by citizens of the Mayan Nation.

The lecture titled "Chiapas Rebellion: A Mayan Woman's Perspective," took place last night at the University of Massachusetts.

Juarez Espinosa began the lecture by reading from a story written by her and published in a magazine directed towards indigenous people. The excerpts read: "I am a very ancient tree. . . with great desires to shed tears since my eyes have dried so many that I'm not able to cry anymore . ."

The Chiapas movement is associated to the Zapatista National Liberation Army (EZLN). This militant group began an armed rebellion against the Mexican government on Jan. 1, 1994. Although a cease fire is in effect the EZLN has promised to fight in case the governor of Chiapas takes office in December. This would be the Governor that won in the "official" election.

Juarez Espinosa said, "This move did not occur all of a sudden on Jan. 1. It is a movement that has been building up."

Conditions now are "confusing" according to Juarez Espinosa. The Mexican government is mostly familiar with towns accessible through paved roads, but not with small towns and the rural areas which can only be reached by foot. Juarez Espinosa said that because the military has a limited geographical knowledge of the area, they do not know who the members of the Zapatista group are or where they can be found. Every citizen became a suspected target.

Organizations who wish to help by donating needed supplies, passage into the occupied areas is made difficult by the military's checking points. There is a lack of cohesion between ally groups and the actual camps; many times the goods are distributed through a special appointed committee.

"The government has been giving

Dollar makes gains due to Fed activity

NEW YORK (AP) — The dollar rose broadly Thursday after the Federal Reserve intervened in the foreign exchange market for the second straight day, buying the U.S. currency for German marks and Japanese yen.

But the dollar finished below its highs for the day as a sluggish bond market and uncertainty about the size and timing of a widely expected interest-rate increase discouraged would-be buyers. Despite support from the American central bank, analysts said the dollar could resume its downward grind next week unless sustained rallies in U.S. securities markets help stimulate demand for the currency.

Stock market rises, interest fears persist

NEW YORK (AP) — The stock market squeaked through a volatile session with minor gains, as persistent fears of higher interest rates curbed enthusiasm about a recovering dollar.

The Dow Jones industrial average posted single-digit gains after bouncing between positive and negative territory all day.

Technology stocks made a strong showing for the third consecutive session, boosting broad-market indexes.

Lack of exports cause fall in crop prices

CHICAGO (AP) — Wheat futures prices faltered Thursday on the Chicago Board of Trade, reflecting slack export prospects. Corn futures edged lower and soybeans rose slightly as traders awaited new production estimates for those crops.

Wheat's losses erased most of Wednesday's gains amid fading hopes for significant export sales in the near term. Grain analyst Dale Gustafson of Smith Barney Inc. said much of the selling was due to profit-taking after two days of gains.

UMass and SUNY work together, build greenways

Students from both schools try to make ecology near Hudson River more accessible

By Franny Legge
Collegian Correspondent

Ten University of Massachusetts students, in coordination with students from State University of New York–Albany, had a vision for the Hudson River area — to preserve and protect the ecological and cultural heritage.

Julius Gyula Fabos, a professor of landscape architecture and regional planning (LARP) and an advisor to the project, said the program was "one of the most significant greenway projects in the United States and one of the country's top cultural heritage projects."

A greenway project, according to the Presidential Commission on American Outdoors in the U.S.A., is a "vision for the future, a living network of greenways to provide people with access to open space close to where they live, and to link together rural and urban spaces in American landscape, threading through cities and country sides like a giant circulation system."

Fabos worked along with UMass alumnus, John Behan, who is currently a visiting professor at SUNY–Albany on the project.

Mary Gerber, a graduate student in the landscape architecture program and student coordinator of the project, said all of the participating students have a great interest in the ecological aspects.

Gerber said her personal reason for becoming involved stemmed from a "passion for the land and a desire to learn landscape architecture."

The study was conducted in the fall of 1993, and included assessing and identifying various historical, cultural and recreational resources, and researching ecological issues.

Over a five week span, the graduate students studied the Hudson river area, which runs through the eastern part of New York state to determine the location of wetlands and rare species habitats.

The team hopes to build bike trails, walking or hiking trails, and visual greenway linkages, Gerber said.

Fabos said the project may take up to two generations before it is implemented due to planning and financing. If the land is not publicly owned, negotiations have to occur with private land holders.

In a recent campus seminar concerning the most current greenway project covering an area of the Connecticut river, one student pointed out that "there will be problems with the actual location because of who owns the land."

Fabos said private land ownership is the norm under greenway plans, with public ownership usually limited to key resources and critical links.

With at least 35 major greenway projects underway in Massachusetts, there are also another 60 or 70 under consideration.

UMass students are also currently working on greenway planning for an area of the Connecticut river that extends from Hadley on the eastern shores, to Northampton, Easthampton and Holyoke on the western shores.

The Hudson River study was designated an outstanding student project for 1994 by the upstate New York chapter of the American Planning Association.

Fabos said that he hopes the Hudson river study "will contribute to public awareness of this great resource and potential for the region and will lead to increased community awareness of the green way."

"My interest is not only in creating hype and awareness, but in how you can actually motivate people to change their beliefs and behavior," Laufer said.

Some of Laufer's firm's services include educating clients, such as the state of California, about earthquake preparedness, and launching Mrs. Field's oat–bran cookies.

Laufer also gives her employees time off to perform community service or take self–enrichment courses. The agency, true to it's environmental cause, fights waste by making two–sided copies and adhering to a no junk–mail mailings policy.

Bathroom segregation?

Chicago–based Midway airlines is launching an innovative new program on their airline: one bathroom for women only, another restroom will be unisex.

The women's restroom includes:

- Dress–length mirror
- Flowers and a hand–painted mural to overcome that "locked–in–a–stinky–closet" feeling.
- Soap and lotion dispensers to keep sinks neat and tidy.

The women's–only bathroom comes as a result of female travelers complaining about airline restrooms. Competitors are not sold on the idea of separate bathrooms. "Isn't that discrimination?" asks Delta's Todd Clay.

Testing to start on abortion pill

American women may soon have access to the controversial French abortion pill, RU–486.

RU–486 is reported to induce abortion if taken within the first 48 hours of pregnancy. The pill is widely available in Europe, but the French manufacturer will not seek distribution rights in the United States because of expected opposition from right–to– lifers.

However, the company has recently donated the patents to RU–486 to Population Council, a research organization that will conduct clinical trials on about 2,000 American women. Brookline, Mass. is a potential trial site. The Food and Drug Administration could approve the drug for use by 1996, pending findings.

Sex Ed. for teens

Surveys say one–third of high school girls have had sex, but less than two–thirds considered it a pleasurable experience, and over 60 percent wished they had waited until they were older. The average age of first intercourse was 15 and for most girls, their "first time" was in their parents' home. Only 9 percent said they had sex in a car on a regular basis. Fewer than two–thirds of the teens said they always used birth control, and 11 percent admitted they never did.

Dynamic duo

The sign on the door reads Sutton and Sutton Media Relations, but the latter Sutton probably isn't who you think it is. The Sutton's are a mother and daughter team, Cynthia and Cydney, at the Dallas–based company.

Cydney, Cynthia's eight–year–old daughter, assists her mother's two full–time employees by collating media– information packets after school or in the evening while she watches television. "Cydney has always been involved in my work, and naming the agency for her makes her really feel a part of it."

New intern plans for the future

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Graduate student Paul Entis said as Hillel's new outreach coordinator, "I want [Jewish Students] to feel like they can be Jewish in all aspects of their lives and feel connected with the Jewish community in any way they are comfortable with."

Entis devotes much of his time promoting diversity. He is in the School of Education's social justice education program where he studies issues of oppression and discrimination. He also works in the Center for Organization, Advising and Programming (formerly Student Affairs Office.)

Entis said he sees college students struggling with their identities and trying to figure out how to live their lives. "I want to let people know there are options to being Jewish in a lot of different ways, with Jewish culture, politics or rituals."

Entis spends a lot of time in the Campus Center, giving out information or getting to know people. On Monday and Thursday he has a table on the concourse and on Tuesday afternoons has an open discussion session he calls "Schmooze with Paul at the Bluewall."

As a former resident director, he said he recognizes an "untapped resource" in the residence halls. He said he is planning programming in and with the residence halls.

Entis said he is optimistic about forming new student groups to satisfy the interests of those who want to get involved.

Currently forming is a group of Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Jews. Entis described it as "a safe space for folks to talk about what its like to be gay and Jewish, ... [and to] plan activities to support this part of community as well as educate the larger heterosexual campus community."

Part of the need for a group of this kind, Entis said, is to make groups that haven't traditionally felt comfortable in the Jewish community, "feel like a part of the family."

The Jewish community is open to everyone, said Entis. He explained that if there is enough student interest, he would like to facilitate groups for Jewish crafts or cooking, social issue groups addressing matters such as AIDS and interfaith relationships or groups for feminist or disabled Jews.

Entis said that although anti–Semitism needs to be dealt with on this campus, and nationally, this issue is only one piece of the puzzle. He said he would like to emphasize all the "positive and exciting, dynamic aspects of being Jewish and not be overshadowed by the scarier and negative things Jews need to deal with every day."

Entis said he does not expect every Jewish student on campus to become active, but feels it is important for Jewish students to know Hillel has resources they can explore.

Therapy needs to address larger issues

By Stephen C. Campbell
Collegian Staff

Therapy needs to make strides to address issues in the queer community, according to an associate professor at the University of Massachusetts.

"Therapists need to be aware of gay and lesbian culture," Deborah Carlin said.

Carlin, associate professor of American studies in the English Department, spoke in a discussion last Wednesday afternoon in the Campus Center entitled, "What Are We Affirming In Gay Affirmative Therapy?"

Carlin, who has a masters degree in social work, has worked as a clinical social work intern at Smith College Counseling and the Veterans Administration for the past two years.

She began the discussion with a brief history around the period in which the American Psychological Association (APA) began to changes its views of homosexuality.

Different opinions on homosexuality from the 1950s and the 1960s used prison samples to gather data, "which caused a generalization of gay men as being criminals," Carlin said.

Before 1973 The American Psychological Association had homosexuality defined as a pathology in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manuals (DSM). After The Stone Wall riots in 1969 pressure from the queer community as well as decisions within the APA caused a vote to have homosexuality removed from the DSM.

In 1973, the term homophobia meaning fear of homosexuals was coined, "Now it means a cultural, attitudinal and personal bias against gay men and lesbians," Carlin said.

"It is homophobia, not homosexuality that creates pathology. Also, there ideally isn't a presence of heterosexual bias that other forms of therapy and developmental theories can have," Carlin said.

"There is a lack of clarity of sexual orientation, and that sexual orientation is not synonymous with sexual identity which is different from gender identity," she said.

According to Carlin, they need to take into account the coming out process and how there is no parallel event in the heterosexual community. She also said that same sex relationships involve different stressors that don't exist in opposite sex relationships.

"Gay Affirmative Therapy involves many of the things that therapists do regularly: reframing, confronting, modeling, advocacy, educating, listening ...over all, any therapist must acknowledge and respect the strength it takes for any individual to maintain a gay, lesbian or bisexual identity development in the face of a hostile culture," Carlin said.

The discussion was presented as part of the Brown Bag Luncheon Series sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns and the Chancellor's Task Force for Gay Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

Wisconsin CEO gives his workers different skills

By Andrew Ferguson
Collegian Staff

A flock of geese would be the ideal work force because each bird understands its responsibility to the entire flock, according to labor innovator Ralph Stayer.

Stayer, the chief executive officer of Johnsonville Foods of Wisconsin, producer of sausages, spoke to more than 100 people last night at Bowker Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts on his innovation in labor methods.

"Each goose takes a turn leading and there is perfect teamwork," Stayer said. "Every goose understands its responsibility to the rest of the flock. The key is that each goose has the same goal."

Stayer has developed a new "team" concept for operating a large company. Stayer got an idea for how a business should run by watching a flock of geese migrate.

"I saw such a huge gap in what we were doing and what we could do — I wasn't satisfied," Stayer said despite the large profit the company was making.

In Stayer's plants, the workers are referred to as members, and according to Stayer, they run the whole business.

The members do all of their own hiring and firing to ensure that new members will fit into the team.

"If you are a team member, you can work together and get the job done." Stayer said.

At Johnsonville Foods, there are no base pay raises according to Stayer. To get a raise, a member must learn a new skill.

Most of the employees have a high school diploma or less, but there are people who have developed extensive skills as accountants, engineers and mechanical technicians, according to Stayer.

"It is immoral to be a leader of a company and not let your employees develop themselves fully" Stayer said.

To insure product quality, members make up teams that test the product themselves on a daily basis, according to Stayer.

"As far as we've seen, its the closest thing to giving employees free reign," said Thomas O'Brien, dean of the School of Management.

Stayer first started at Johnsonville Foods in 1965 and by 1978 the company had revenues of more than $10 million. This year, Stayer's company had profits of more than $160 million. By 1997, Stayer said he expects the firm to be making more than $400 million.

"But the thing that gets me up tomorrow is that there is still so much to accomplish, so much to learn," he said.

more to the indigenous people but it has been very limited and there is always something they want in return," said Juarez Espinosa.

After the lecture, the floor then opened up for questions among which a student asked specifically about the role of the Mayan woman in the Chiapas movement. Juarez Espinosa explained that many Mayan women did not speak Spanish and were not present at the actual talks between the Zapatista delegation and Mexican authorities. The participation of women and teenagers was concentrated in the guerilla camps.

A translator assisted Juarez Espinosa who only speaks Spanish and one of the native tongues of the region. The event was sponsored by the Women of Color Program, AHORA, Forum on Developing Nations, New World Theater, Anacaona Cultural Center, MEXICA and the Latin American Cultural Center.

"For those who understand our situation I ask a favor: speak up and help conserve the very few of us that are left," Juarez Espinosa said to the audience.

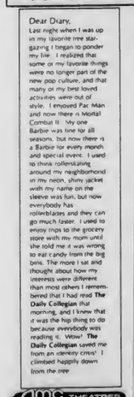
Shh, baby... you don't have to shout so much!



Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree

University must act for athletes

Students grades are a private thing, something no one should be allowed to casually leaf through in a class, or anywhere for that matter. The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act, as stated in the undergraduates rights and responsibilities book, says that academic records are "kept in the sole possession of the person who made the record and are not accessible or revealed to any other person. . ."

And that means any student — regardless of race, class, gender, sexual preference — every student.

In a journalism class on Tuesday, Brad Smith of the Springfield Union News passed around transcripts of players on the men's basketball team he had received — the same ones used to write the Boston Globe story.

Smith also had a document containing the names and grade point averages of other Black student athletes, which he passed around the class. When asked, Smith said he didn't think it was relevant that the document contained only the records of Black student athletes.

The racist implications of such a document are overwhelming. Why are only Black student athletes being singled out, not only in the list, but also in the Globe story?

Every student on campus, regardless of race or participation in an athletic team, should be given the same right to privacy as everyone else. No one should have to hear from other students or read in the paper that their grades have been put on display.

The stalling and inaction must come to an end. The University must do something now to protect student athletes, and all students in general. Race should not be an issue when it comes to privacy, and the University has to take responsibility for these actions and make sure nothing like this happens again. Black student athletes, and all University students, won't accept anything less.

Just like Mom always said . . .

Question 2 is a good idea, requiring the use of seatbelts in Massachusetts, but the administration isn't daring to go far enough. That's right voters, since we lack the wisdom to follow good advice and listen to common sense, we should take all the matronly rhetoric we've been handed since we were children and make it the law of the land. We obviously can't think for ourselves, so it's up to the lawmakers to take mothering out of the home and put it where it really belongs, in the House.

Let's take all of that childhood lecturing that used to seem so dreadfully boring to us at the time and make it into brand new shiny laws, complete with stiff penalties for violators to boot! It's too late to get any of this done for the upcoming election, but with enough hard work, I'm sure that we can get this done in time for the next one. We could start a grass roots campaign to get an amendment on the ballot making provisions for a collection of laws to make sure we're all safe and warm, coddled like the children Question 2 seems to think that we are.

This "Madre Charta" would make sure we would never again have to worry about some hooligan running loose on our streets with a lollipop sticking out of their mouths. Or some menace to society stepping on a crack for the sole purpose of breaking his mother's back, not to mention the cretin known as the non seat belt wearer, they'd all be locked up, for the greater good of society.

The "Madre Charta" will include, but not be limited to the following proposals:

The Mastication Proclamation: This law would provide just and swift punishment for anyone convicted of not chewing each bite of food at least 25 times. This ungodly practice leads to innumerable chokings, driving up insurance rates and already skyrocketing health care costs. Telling people to chew properly isn't enough. Those violators will be punished with a $50 fine or their jaw wired shut for three days or both.

The Molar Voter Bill: This law would ensure that all Massachusetts citizens are brushing properly. Front and back teeth, twice a day for at least two minutes, in an up and down motion, with a fluoride toothpaste. Violators will be subject to three verifiable dental cleanings and regular check-ups.

The Cramp Act: This law states that any person near a swimmable body of water (public or private) will not enter said body of water until at least one half hour has passed since the individual has last eaten. How many times has this dangerous practice lead to acute cramping, forcing our already overworked and underpaid lifeguards to spring into action risking life and limb to pull this wretched piece of refuge out of danger? This heinous crime will be punishable with a $70 fine and loss of sunscreen privileges for the rest of the day in question.

Trust me, these laws will make life easier on all of us. Imagine the luxury of not having to take on any adult responsibilities, of having some of the advantages of living with our parents without actually having to do it. No more having to make decisions on our own.

A family's interpretation of fun

Caleb Cochran

Fun. It's the one thing we all lust after with reckless abandon. The curious thing, is that the definition of fun varies from person to person. It's interesting that such a universal term has such different interpretations.

For example, take my brother. For him, fun consists of going to the local mall with his buddies. They try on hats at The Pro Image and look at all the new sneakers. They look at all the CDs that they want to buy at Sam Goody. None of these 15-year-olds have any money, of course, so the fun is quite limited. When they walk out of the mall, the young lads are left with nothing but memories. Alas, fun nonetheless.

My parents' ideas about fun are quite different. For mom, a few miles of speed walking with one of our friendly neighbors usually fulfills the daily requirement of chuckles. Don't ask me to explain this, because I simply can't. I've gone along with mom on some of these walks, and I can't understand how anyone can possibly walk so fast without breaking out into a full sprint.

Mom claims that walking is better for your joints than running. However, she swings her arms back and forth with such speed and force that one day they are simply going to fly off of her torso. I fail to see how healthy knees are going to help her then.

For dad, fly fishing is numero uno on the fun list. The most fun that I have with dad, however, is shopping. I've never seen a better bargain hunter than my dad.

The man can go into any discount department store in the nation and come out with an entire wardrobe for under $25. We'll go up to Ames on any given Saturday looking to buy a can of tennis balls or a roll of electrical tape or something, and before I know it, we're in the men's department. "Need a shirt?," he'll ask. "Look at these — only $12!"

I never have the patience to wade through the piles of gaudy polyester garbage in search of that treasured bargain, so I'll proceed to go off and search for the tennis balls or the electrical tape. When I return, my dad always has something to show for his efforts, be it the aforementioned $12 shirt or a $19 pair of Levi's. The size is never quite right, but this never dissuades dad. "I can always hem a few inches off these babies," he'll say. Yeah, but you can't add three inches to the waist.

For yours truly, fun is often an elusive pursuit. I think the reason for this is that I always have such fabulous expectations that reality can never measure up.

A few weeks ago I drove out to Boston with one of my good friends. The ride out consisted of a discussion of what the trip would entail. After a night of carousing, we would spend the following day enjoying the city.

Well, after we managed to make asses out of ourselves several times in the span of a few hours (that's another column) we woke up the next morning too tired to do anything except drive home and sleep. The ride to Boston, with high expectations of the weekend to come, was the highlight of the trip.

Which isn't to say that I never have any experiences which live up to their expectations. I've had plenty. The images of these fun times are often the ones that produce lofty expectations of the future. When things are really great and suddenly they're just O.K., the change seems drastically worse.

The reality, of course, is that there are a lot things worse than being O.K. Without getting too sappy, it's important to remember that there are a lot of people out there who have real problems: health problems, marital problems, alcohol problems, etc. Somehow, my worries about having a fun weekend don't seem so important when contrasted with the problems that I could have, and don't.

So go out there and have a fun weekend. If you're stumped for ideas, my dad is always looking for someone to take him shopping.

Trying out different relationships

Michelle Lugo

"My last girlfriend was half Puerto Rican, one quarter Jewish, and one quarter Vietnamese," some guy I just met at a party explained to me.

"So what?" I felt like saying. "Does that make you more qualified to date me or something? Or, are you just trying to come across as open-minded? Because if that is the case, just tell me you are an open-minded individual who dates a diversity of people," I thought to myself.

Instead I replied, "My last boyfriend (regardless of race) was plain foolish."

A short, unpolished, but honest answer on the subject because first of all I don't like guys to talk to me about their ex-girlfriends, especially if they're on the rebound. Secondly, that's almost always the manner I'm approached. Over the last few years I've met people who have dated "interesting" combinations of people, to say the very least.

There are many aspects to a person one dates and they are all connected one way or another. For example, me — I'm Puerto Rican which means I speak Spanish, I am Catholic, I have dark skin, I eat Puerto Rican food, and like merengue and salsa music. Of course the Puerto Ricans are not a monolithic group, I'm just speaking generally.

Usually I meet people very easily and first dates are not a problem. The trouble is that, sooner or later, I will want to go out and eat Puerto Rican food. Once in a while, I will want to go out and dance merengue and salsa. Also, I will most definitely be speaking in Spanish half the time because that is my native tongue. I've have been in the States for six years and have adapted well but I'm unwilling to conform completely from the culture which I was raised in, something that is such a huge part of me.

Now, you tell me, where can I find the individual who is is willing to try these activities and feel comfortable doing so? Not many I can tell you from experience.

No matter how great and open-minded the guy was, there came a point in time when he would say something to the likes of, "not that again, let's do something normal for a change." Sometimes it was me who decided it was not worth it because I became tired of explaining everything to that person so he would not feel bored or excluded.

I'm sounding too critical of interracial dating but on the contrary, I think that the college years is the best time to be dating different people because hopefully you are a little more mature and because college tends to be a pretty liberal environment. However, it takes work and honestly it drains all your energy. Why? Because you will have to make a lot of compromises . . . and who needs the extra work anyway?

The more time goes by, the more I am set in my ways, and the less I want to have to conform to living someone else's culture. I live the "gringo" lifestyle everyday just by living in this country. In my spare time, I want to be able to do things that relate to my culture. Relationships are roller coaster rides anyway, with interracial relationships there are just some added loops along the way. I admire people who make these type of relationships work because they probably must have made sacrifices to be with each other.

This doesn't mean that I only date Puerto Ricans because they are the only ones who can possibly relate to me. I look for other qualities and common interests too. Eventually I will date who ever I please.

School symbol still offensive to some

To the editor:

I am following up the letter from Martin F. Jones (Oct. 26) titled "Source of former protest actually a freedom symbol" regarding the Minuteman symbol of UMass. While it may be so that the Minuteman is a symbol of freedom, there was another issue last year which I believe also raises the issue of freedom.

It is the UMass Insignia which includes an arm holding a sword raised above the head of a Native American. This insignia appears on a plethora of University paraphernalia, from notebooks and drinking mugs to state vehicles and doorways, as well as many more.

I cannot stop thinking how unwelcoming and painful this must be to Native American students who come here. In addition, how well does it serve any student to have murder and extermination virtually enshrined by the state in its maintenance of this insignia for Massachusetts?

I urge everyone so concerned to let Chancellor David K. Scott and President Michael K. Hooker know how you feel. For my part, I would say let the Native American stand there for himself to represent a new kind of freedom — freedom from oppression — while all of us who care about people continue to work for this freedom about people continue to work for this freedom in every aspect of university life.

Noise bothers dorm resident

To the editor:

I sit here in an upper floor of Brown at 11:30 a.m. Saturday. According to the Residence Hall Manual, quiet hours exist until about 12 p.m. on Saturdays, but I guess noise from outside of the dorm can be made at any hour. I was woken up at 11 a.m. by very loud music which I initially thought was coming from the dorm building.

Opening my window to try and locate the jerk who woke me up, I realized that it was not coming from within the dorm, but instead from an athletic field below where the field hockey team was warming up for a game.

I cannot think of any other athletic team on campus for whom this might be a problem; most fields are away from the dorms to the best of my knowledge. I have nothing against the field hockey team itself either, but I deserve my right to sleep in peace.

I did not have my window open last night so please don't say that it is my own fault. I stayed up late last night; should I be punished for that?

Please publish this letter as a friendly reminder to everyone that loud noise of any kind during quiet hours, whether coming from inside or outside the dorm is RUDE.

By the way, I hope UMass won the field hockey game on Saturday.

Drug wars are ruining our country

To the editor:

A word about marijuana legalization: everyone should be in favor of it, not because they approve of getting high, but because the drug wars are ruining our country.

Remember Prohibition? Who were the big, bad, really mean guys? The "drug" or alcohol runners — the Mafia. What did they do? Perform acts of violence and shoot each other in the streets. Did legal action suppress them? No.

Why not? Because they were making untraceable, untaxed income hand over fist. In fact, the only thing that is different between then and now is that Prohibition was repealed. If the drug laws were repealed, what would happen to the drug dealers and cartels? They would lose funding. To a great extent, they would end.

The benefits to America do not stop there. Many jobs would be created (American jobs) in the growing, processing, and distributing of these drugs. New government institutions would be needed to regulate these industries.

Taxes — large taxes — could be collected at every step of the way. Our jail population would be cut by 1/3 or more, at a savings of $25,000.00 per prisoner per year. The drug enforcement portion of the budgets for the CIA, the FBI, and the state and local police could be utilized for a variety of other programs.

None of this addresses the huge number of other valuable uses of marijuana, as fiber, as medicine, or as a fuel source, currently untapped.

The debate on the morality of marijuana is fruitless and impractical. Serious men and women, GOP and Democratic alike, should agitate for the legalization, for the good of all.

Cotton brings blues to Pearl St.

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

These years in music are clearly not the prime of "the blues." One might argue that the prime ended anywhere from 40 to 50 years ago, along with jazz. Nevertheless, there are still shattered remnants of those great music crafts floating around in the distortion-pop-alternative world of today, like harmonica player and singer James Cotton.

Now 59-years-old, Cotton can still wail his lungs harder than any Billy Corgan or Chris Cornell, yet that blues howling is a scratchy shout nowadays due to a rugged tour schedule. Cotton is on the road nearly 45 weeks this year. Although, he misses his Memphis, Tenn. home, he still loves playing for the people.

Born in Tunica, Miss. in 1935, Cotton grew up in a slightly musical household as he had a harmonica-playing mother. He quickly took up the craft, and by the time he was nine he was earning enough money playing on the streets of his town to support him and his parents, as he was making more than his father could in two weeks on a farm. Cotton took a liking to the raucous urban bluesman Sonny Boy Williamson, who soon after adopted young James as his apprentice, an association that lasted six years.

In the early '50s, Cotton landed a job playing drums for the famous singer/harmonica player Howlin' Wolf. About a year later, in 1953, he was recording his first solo material for Sun Records, singing, but without harmonica.

The blues equivalent to The Beatles in rock 'n roll, Muddy Waters, asked Cotton to join his band to replace another great harmonica player in the history of blues, Junior Wells. The collaboration lasted 12 years. Unfortunately, though, for Cotton, he was not able to stretch his playing like he wanted. Muddy was a vigorous band leader in search of the sound yet another master blues harpist, Little Walter, had created earlier on in the '50s, even before Wells joined the band.

In 1966, Cotton formed his own solo band, recording on Verve records, and has recorded solo (with many variations in his backing bands over the years) since then on many different labels with guests like Dr. John, Buddy Guy, Mike Bloomfield (late guitarist for The Butterfield Blues Band and The Electric Flag, two '60s blues revival bands). He also joined Junior Wells, Billy Branch and Carey Bell to record the 1989 album Harp Attack!.

1994 brings Cotton back to Verve Records on his summer release, Living The Blues.

You have seen his credentials as an authentic walking museum of blues history, and now, if you attend this Saturday's show, you will be able to hear his raspy blues howl and his biggest claim to fame, his harmonica playing. Cotton is said to play so hard that he can suck the reeds out of a harmonica and spit them back out, or just completely collapse the instrument. In any case, he is a living example of a great time in American music.

James Cotton will perform at Pearl Street on Nov. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are available at For The Record, Tix Unlimited, The Northampton Box Office and Strawberries. For more information, call 584-7771.

Bowker features acclaimed guitarist's talents

COURTESY DEAN COLLINS
Guitarist William Kanengiser

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Remarkable, amazing and dizzying. These are just a few of the words that have struck various observers after experiencing one of William Kanengiser's guitar playing, which will be on display Sunday night in Bowker Auditorium.

Kanengiser's program will include works by Handel, Loris Chobanian and several works written specifically for Kanengiser by other composers.

Building a reputation for himself as a performer able to tackle works that are not traditional guitar pieces, Kanengiser has adapted works from composers such as Handel and Mozart. His ability to present intricate works with extremely smooth execution and clarity while keeping a relaxed stage presence has earned him accolades here and abroad.

The guitarist is a recipient of the National Endowment for the Arts Solo Recitalist Fellowship and has won first prize in the Concert Artists Guild New York Competition and the Concorse Internationl du Guitarre in Paris, as well as being named as one of the 1990 Young Artists of the Year by Musical America.

Yet classical is not the only style that Kanengiser likes to delve into, as he has been known to integrate such elements as jazz, bluegrass and folk into his shows. Many of those different facets are contained in the works that have been written by fellow composer and fellow guitarist Brian Head.

Only involved in the national and international music scene for a few years, Kanengiser will be sure to give guitar aficionados and lovers of varied musical styles a performance not soon to be forgotten.

William Kanengiser will perform in Bowker Auditorium on Sunday at 7 p.m. Tickets are $15 and $10 for the general public and half price for Five College students. For more information, please call 545-2511.

Dropping leaves and caramel apples into the pot

Mike's Mental Stew
– by Mike MacLean

Many things come to mind when the wind in the Valley picks up and you walk into class for the first time with a cold nose and red ears. It's autumn in New England, and for me it brings back many memories that coincided with the changing of the leaves.

Once the weather started getting cold, a favorite thing for me was putting on a pair of jeans and a sweatshirt, some old cruddy sneakers, and destroying someone's lawn (usually my own) with a game of football. These games always seemed to start out as flag-football games, but usually ended up being an all out bone crunch-fest.

One of the best things about these games were the grass stains you'd end up with on your knees afterwards. But if you were truly lucky, you wouldn't get any holes in the knees because you had Toughskins. Remember those? The jeans with the cardboard-like reinforcements in the knees? I'm not exactly proud to say that I wore these, but hey, I was only eight, fashion meant nothing.

Another thing that comes with every fall is the abundance of acorns that accumulated on the ground. This was real big in my neighborhood. There was nothing more important than saying there was going to be a neighborhood-wide acorn fight just to have the excuse to pile pounds of acorns into your shirt and horde them from everyone else.

Yes, we would gather buckets of them, and I'm sure got more than a couple of squirrels just a tad bit irate at us. The weird thing is, the anticipated fight never came. Most years we would just try to steal each other's acorns (were we a bit bored? . . . yeah, just a little) but a couple of times we actually got to throw a few. It's amazing how much an acorn stings when it hits you. I came home with some pretty nasty welts sometimes.

Looking back, I'd never think of doing that today, it's amazing someone didn't lose an eye, I mean it's all fun and games until. . .

Autumn always meant going back to school for me, and that meant that most activities done outdoors were done after school, in the twilight hours of the day just as it was becoming cold enough to see your breath. Homework had to be put off until night because had to get a good number of kickball games in before the sun went down.

Some other things that I can remember hating when I was a kid don't look so bad in retrospect. For instance, remember those seemingly endless drives with the parents through the foliage to some remote apple farm? I say endless because when you're little you seem to have no sense of time. But getting a caramel apple once we reached our destination always seemed to make it all worthwhile.

Autumn today is just a colorful as I remember it, and although we don't have enormously large mountains, I'd like to think we love our scenery just as much as those on a Rocky Mountain high (that hurt to say.)

Often though, among all the classes, parties and studying, it all seems to pass a little too fast and we start to take it all for granted.

So I like to just go outside, fill my lungs with some chilling air and let my cheeks get flushed, to remind me of playing in the light of the street lamps in an old pair of Toughskins.

Wanda wanted night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had sedated the man in the yellow hat and had commandeered the Prince of Malaya's limo, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with the third-ranked rusher in Division I-AA, with 146.8 ypg.

Ingoglia's 183-yard performance pushed his season total over 1000 for the second straight season [1,174 yards], and his career total over 3,000 [3,115 yards], ranking him ninth in the all-time Massachusetts record books.

The Minutemen defense is currently ranked 16th in the country, allowing 284.8 ypg. Standing out of as of late has been the defensive backfield, led by cornerbacks Breon Parker and Tony Williams, who rank fifth in Division I-AA in pass-efficiency defense with an 84.9 rating.

The Minutemen lost a tough one last weekend against Boston University, 28-24. An exciting game for the 15,214 fans in attendance [most in seven years at McGuirk], the Minutemen just couldn't squeeze out the win against the No. 7 Terriers.

"Last Saturday was a fun afternoon," said Hodges. "I told [Athletic Director] Bob Marcum I wish I was in the stands. It was a great football game. The only part I didn't enjoy was when that fourth pass fell incomplete."

"We had an opportunity to win, and we should have won."

Regardless of last week's disappointing loss, the players are heading into tomorrow's game with the same mentality they have utilized all season.

"We play the game the same way, whether the opponent is 8-0 or 0-8," said offensive tackle Joe Sabella. "The level of the competition doesn't matter."

"We have been preparing [this week] the same as we have been preparing all season," said defensive tackle Ben Albert. "It's just a matter of us playing our game."

One of their main assets is that they keep coming at you," he said.

Koch said Massachusetts must be on guard for a let-down because there is a tendency to look ahead to a possible championship game on Sunday. But he also added that he does not anticipate it happening because they have gotten up for and played well against lesser teams all season.

"Friday is such an important game because people are thinking about playing Rutgers in the finals, but if you don't play West Virginia, all that talk is a waste of time," he said. "We are going to be prepared for the game so I don't think there will be a problem. We have shown [in wins against] Holy Cross, St. Bonaventure and Philadelphia Textile that we are doing the job in order to win."

Neither Petracco nor Temple Coach Lauren Fuchs expect this game to be as lopsided as the first one.

"We're expecting a battle," Fuchs said. "We're expecting a low scoring game."

"Temple embarrassed us," said Petracco. "We just need to play the level of field hockey that we're capable of. We have yet to put in a full solid 70 minutes. We're hungry. We've waited all season for this game."

The Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, Coach of the Year, Rookie of the Year and All-Conference Team will be awarded tonight at the Atlantic 10 field hockey banquet. While Donnelly and Fuchs declined speculation on the award winners, Petracco had some strong feelings about the potential winners.

"I don't like the way the voting is done. All through the year, the media relations departments vote for the offensive and defensive players of the week," Petracco said. "Then for the yearly awards, it is the coaches. We can't vote for our own players and we only see the other players once a season."

The tournament will serve as Rutgers' final field hockey games in the Atlantic 10, as the Lady Knights will join the Big East next season. The move clearly weakens the division.

"Losing a team kills us field hockey-wise," Fuchs said.

"I'm going to miss the A-10," Petracco said. "We've had a good relationship and we've had some success. The conference has been very supportive of field hockey."

in Morgantown earlier this season, 6-15, 16-14, 15-12, 15-7.

"They blocked us very well last time," Kenny said. "Since then, we've opened up our offense a little bit, but we're still going to have to contain them."

The Mounaineers are led by Sarah Evers, who is fourth in the Atlantic 10 in hitting percentage at .263.

"We've been fortunate this year, we haven't dropped any matches to teams we shouldn't have," Kenny said.

The Colonials are another story entirely. George Washington comes in with a 25-3 mark, and their 9-1 record in A-10 play puts them in a tie for the conference lead with Rhode Island. The Colonials only league defeat came at the hands of the Minutewomen, who upset the defending A-10 champs 8-15, 16-14, 15-12, 15-6 earlier this year in Washington, D.C.

"They are definitely going to come in here chomping at the bit," Kenny said.

GW has a whole host of weapons that the Minutewomen are going to have to stop if they are to defeat the Colonials again.

Sveta Vryurina is the league leader in kills, and has led the Atlantic 10 in that category for the last two years. The outside hitter was an All-A-10 selection last year, along with teammate, outside hitter Liu Li. Li is third in the A-10 in kills and digs, while leading the conference in hitting efficiency.

"They have about six or eight weapons we'll have to stop," Kenny said.

The Colonials also have the top three blockers in the league, all of whom will have their hands full with UMass' collection of outside hitters.

Sophomore Giza Rivera leads the Minutewomen in kills, and is second in the conference. Freshman Lesley Nolan is also in the top 10, and stands fourth in digs. This week's A- 10 Player of the Week, sophomore Dionne Nash will also be a factor.

"We have to buckle down and finish strong," Kenny said.

Playoff time for water polo

Victory will give Minutemen a berth into NCAA's in Calif.

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Correspondent

It's the big one.

The University of Massachusetts men's water polo team will be putting it all on the line this weekend at the Eastern Water Polo Association Varsity North Division Playoffs in Providence, R.I.

A victory this weekend will give the team a berth in the NCAA Championships in Long Beach, Calif.

Last year was the first berth for the Minutemen in the NCAA Tournament. UMass was also the first East Coast school ever to defeat a West Coast school, beating California-San Diego 15-13.

Going into the single elimination tournament this weekend, the Minutemen are seeded first over past competitors Navy [2], Queens [3], Brown [5], Harvard [7] and Villanova [8].

"We should fair well," Coach Russ Yarworth said. "UMass has been the favorite all season. It won't be easy. We'll do what we have to do."

Their toughest competitor in the tournament will be second-seed Navy. In a prescason matchup, Navy defeated UMass 13-11.

The Limardo brothers led the game in goals, with junior Luis [101 goals, 0.607 pctg., 92 quarters played] scoring four and freshman Juan Carlos [0.509 pctg., 60 points, 84 quarters] with three of his own.

"The [Navy] game will be a battle," said Yarworth. "We'll take one game at a time. Every game's important."

This past week, the team has been working on the final touches.

"This is what we've been practicing for all season," senior co-captain Javier Gonzalez [106 goals, 0.556 pctg., 105 quarters] said. "We're taking it easy in practice, working on the mistakes we shouldn't make."

The Baldy View Tournament in Claremont, Calif., two weekends ago helped the Minutemen prepare for the upcoming playoffs.

"The California games helped us out a lot," said Gonzalez. "We played well, even though we lost. We should do well."

Their first matchup will be on Saturday morning with Villanova University. When they last met, UMass was victorious with a 14-5 win.

Saturday evening, the Minutemen will meet Brown University. UMass swept them with a 16-4 victory at the Cambridge Invitational. Luis Limardo [168 shots, 0.607 pctg., 92 quarters played] scored five goals in this contest.

This will be familiar territory for the Minutemen from last weekend's EWPA North playoffs at Brown, where they swept M.I.T., Brown and Harvard, and won the North Division title.

UMass also defeated Queens last week with a score of 22- 11. Gonzalez and Limardo both had six goals a piece. Senior co-captain Adolfo Oliete [76 shots, 65 points, 106 quarters] had a two-pointer.

"We played great this weekend," said Limardo. "Javy scored, I scored, but also Adolfo Oliete and Greg Menton. If everybody scores, we play great defense with Alex Mujica in goal, who for me is the best and most intelligent in the nation."

Junior Alex Mujica [135 saves, 0.538 pctg., 63 quarters] will start in goal on Saturday.

success story. After ruling ECAC Division III for years, the Dutchmen skated into the first division in 1991-92, and subsequently got their lumps. But after paying its dues, Union actually recorded a winning conference record last year [10-9-3] as well as overall [15-11-4].

Union lost only one player off last year's team, but was beaten by its first common opponent with UMass, that being Providence, 7-5.

The Dutchmen host Army tonight, and the UMass-Union game can be seen on Continental Cablevision. WHMP 1400 AM and 99.3 FM will carry tonight's game.

Rink notes: The UMass Hockey office will send a videotape to Brendan Sheehy, Director of Hockey East Officials. Mallen could not comment on its contents, as league coaches are instructed not to discuss officiating with media.

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A close friend's advice on investments may be well-intentioned but still cost you money. Team effort makes quick work of a difficult job assignment.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Things should go more smoothly today. Take stock of where you stand career-wise and where you should be headed. Ask a trusted friend for advice. Some travel could prove beneficial to your financial interests.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Romance could change your whole outlook this weekend. Get your work done so that you can leave the office early. Unless you deal with a career or financial situation honestly, your plans could backfire.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): As long as you are in a commanding position, be right. Wait for events to indicate what you should do next. Sudden changes are possible. A friendship is developing along an exciting new path.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Take no chances today. Unconventional behavior would be a mistake. Although a pal's wild antics may be entertaining, you cannot afford to act the same way. Be practical when making long-range plans.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): An emotional upset calls for the utmost self-restraint. Refuse to be diverted from the job at hand. Let children know that you understand their problems and will try to help. Your support works wonders!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An indirect approach could work best today. You need to tell the truth no matter how much it hurts. Search for the right words. Romance moves into a more fulfilling period. Show your tender side.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Take things one step at a time today. Confusion could lead to a fiasco. Loved ones look to you for emotional support. You can be a tower of strength to a friend in need.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Create a strong incentive or goal for the day. You can accomplish wonders when your mind is in gear. Computers illuminate what is in the balance. Use wit and reason when working the money game.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Impressive mental ideas are given a challenge or other close alliance. Your ability to work smarter to offset your current run of good luck. Be wary of romance on the rebound. Appearances can be deceiving.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Avoid displaying a hostile attitude if a personality clash or other business disagreement looms. A patient approach could result in a breakthrough. Make time in your schedule for teen-agers. They need your interest and encouragement.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): An early-morning squabble may be related to your having to put in overtime. Jittery reactions should blow over quickly, making the rest of the day a breeze. Be more assertive where romance is concerned.

Minutewomen set to host A–10 tournament

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team will be looking to defend its title starting today at the 1994 Atlantic 10 women's soccer tournament at Richard F. Garber field. The first game starts at 12 p.m. and the second will follow at 2 p.m. Here's a look at the tourney pairings.

No. 2 GW vs. No. 3 Temple

The first game of the afternoon features the second–seed Lady Colonials and the third–seed Owls. When the two teams met earlier in the year at Temple, GW came up with the win, 2–1 in OT.

Leading the way for the Colonials will be leading scorer and A–10 Rookie of the Year Chemar Smith. In the regular season, the freshman forward scored 10 goals and three assists for 23 points. Forward Kristin Davidson [six goals and four assists for 16 points] and midfielder Kristin Robertson [five goals, four assists for 14 points] will both be a threat to score along with Smith. Sophomore Traci Jensen will likely get the start in goal. Jensen has started in 15 games and has a 0.915 goals–against average.

Leading the way for Temple has been Patrice Rutland. The senior has scored 12 goals and dished out eight assists for 32 points. Kim Fitzgerald is the second–leading scorer with eight goals and two assists for 18 points. Playing in the net for the Owls will be junior Carla Moyer. Moyer has been filling in for keeper Vickie Dilks, starting 10 games.

The winner of this game will go up against the winner of game No. 2, which pits UMass against Rutgers University.

No. 1 UMass vs. No. 4 Rutgers

The revenge factor should definitely be in effect when these two teams meet. Earlier in the year at Rutgers, the two teams went into overtime where the Minutewomen came out with the win on a Tina Lightning goal.

"[Rutgers] was very upset," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "They felt they should have won. I'm sure they are really looking forward to getting another crack at it."

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, with Rebecca Myers [pictured], are the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament held at Garber Field.

Leading the way for the Lady Knights in the regular season was senior midfielder Chrissy Sheerin and junior forward/midfielder Valerie Duccilli. Duccilli had four goals and three assists for 11 points while Sheerin compiled three goals and two assists for eight points.

"Sheerin's a great breakaway threat," Rudy said. "[Duccilli] has a high work rate, she gets it done."

Sophomore Susan Curtis will be in goal, where she has a 1.76 goals against average and three shutouts.

The Minutewomen will once again be led by scoring threats Rebecca Myers and Nicole Roberts. Myers has 10 goals and four assists for 24 points from her midfield position, while the forward Roberts has 10 goals and three assists for 23 points.

Also leading the way for UMass will be the 1994 A–10 Player of the Year, sophomore defender Erin Lynch. Lynch has been one of the most steady performers for the Minutewomen all year, scoring 10 points on four goals and two assists. Freshman Danielle Dion will once again get the start in net. She has yet to give up a goal in A–10 play.

This weekend could be the last home game for the two seniors, Melissa Mitchell and Heidi Kocher. The two both left their marks on UMass women's soccer.

"[Melissa] consistently gave 110 percent every game, maybe even more than that. She comes to play every game no matter who the opponent is," Rudy said. "[Heidi's] been so steady, very steady all year. She's established a mark as one of the better attacking defenders [in the country]."

The championship match will be Sunday at 1 p.m.

The Atlantic 10 awards were given out last night at the A– 10 Banquet. Named to the A–10 All–Conference team from UMass was Dion, Kocher, Lynch, Myers and Roberts; with Lynch getting Player of the Year honors. GW swept the rest of the special awards with Smith winning Rookie of the Year and Coach Shannon Higgins–Clrovski winning Coach of the Year. Davidson, Amanda Simmons and Smith, all of GW, were named to the All–Conference team along with Rutgers' Pamela Pitchok, St. Bonaventure's Jo Storms and Temple's Rutland.

Men's soccer No. 1 seed in the A-10

By Brian Gormley
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team will begin their quest for the Atlantic 10 championship when they face West Virginia at the A–10 tournament at Rutgers University today.

The winner of the this game will play the winner of the other semi–final game, between St. Joseph's University and Rutgers, for the championship on Sunday.

Massachusetts comes into the game as A–10 regular season champions with a record of 12–5–1 overall, including 6–1 in the conference.

The Minutemen had three players named to the Atlantic 10 All–Conference Team, which was released yesterday afternoon. Defender Karsten Bremke, midfielder Mike Doyle and forward Dave Siljanovski are the Minutemen's representatives. Goalkeeper Mark Wolf made the "Honorable Mention" All–Conference Team.

Massachusetts Coach Sam Koch was named Coach of the Year and Bremke the A–10 Rookie of the Year. Koch, who has guided the Minutemen to their third A–10 Tournament in the past four years, was also named the conference's Co–Coach of the Year in 1992.

The Mountaineers enter the tournament with 10 wins against eight losses and one tie overall, and are 3–4 in A–10 play. The Minutemen defeated West Virginia on Oct. 7 in Morgantown, 1–0.

Koch said West Virginia is a formidable opponent, but one that the Minutemen should be able to handle if they play up to their potential.

"West Virginia has some dangerous players. They have two front runners that can definitely score, they have a sweeper who is one of the best we have played against and they have a good goalkeeper. We will not get any goals easily," Koch said.

"We are going against a team that can definitely beat us, but we are going to concentrate on what we do well and on our game and let West Virginia worry about us."

The front runners Koch was referring to are freshman forward Andy Leardini and junior midfielder Travis Furbee. Leardini leads the team with 15 goals and 33 points. Both of these figures were also tops among all A–10 scorers. Furbee has six goals and 13 points. Leardini is coming off of a three–goal performance in West Virginia's last game, a 4–1 victory over Virginia Tech.

Leardini was also named to the A–10 All–Conference Team, the only freshman to earn that distinction this season. West Virginia defenders Mark Reilly and Todd Gispert made the "Honorable Mention" All Conference Team.

Koch said the Mountaineers dominated the second half during their win against the Minutemen earlier this season. West Virginia Coach John McGrath said his team has a chance to win the game if they play as well as they did the first time against Massachusetts.

"We had a real good game down here the last time we played them, but we were just unlucky. They scored and we didn't," McGrath said. "If we play the same style again we should be alright."

McGrath described the Mountaineer style of play as the "control game," which means they prefer to keep the ball at their feet rather than hit a lot of long balls. He said Massachusetts is a tough team to play because they are a very aggressive, attacking type of team.

"UMass is an aggressive team that keeps the pressure on you. They make you play much faster.

Football set to host winless NU Huskies

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The goals have changed, but the spirit remains the same.

Entering this season, the University of Massachusetts football team set two separate goals — one was a Yankee Conference title [an automatic bid to the Division I–AA], or a record good enough to get voted into post–season play.

"We can't send them out as YanCon champions, we can't send them out with playoff action. What we can do is send them out 7-4."

–Mike Hodges, Minutemen Coach

Now, heading into the ninth week, the Minutemen [4–4 overall, 3–3 in YanCon] do not have a chance to win the conference, and, with the four conference losses, have virtually no shot at the post–season.

The chance they do have is to win their final three games, all at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, over the next few weekends. That would mean a 7–4 record, one shy of last year's impressive 8–3 mark.

"The senior class has been going through a very bad time lately," Coach Mike Hodges said. "We can't send them out as YanCon champions, we can't send them out with playoffs. What we can do is send them out 7–4."

The first one is tomorrow as Massachusetts hosts Northeastern [0–8, 0–5] at 12:30 p.m. The record includes zero wins, but that doesn't mean the Minutemen expect an easy ride.

Hodges and the players refuse to downplay Saturday's opponent. They feel that any team in the YanCon, including Northeastern, is capable of beating the other.

"One of the things that a game [like the one we had against BU] teaches you is that there's another Saturday, and we have one against Northeastern," Hodges said. "And any time a team is 0–8, it scares you."

"Look at the scores, they haven't been blown out," said senior defensive end Brian Corcoran. "They've got a good team."

The best game of the season thus far for the Huskies had to be the William & Mary game, where they battled the Tribe right down to the wire before bowing, 17–12. W&M was, at the time, undefeated and in first atop the YanCon standings.

As for Northeastern, offensive threats do not run deep. Wide receiver Tom Monios did have a big game last week, though, catching five passes for 124 yards and earning Honorable Mention YanCon Offensive Player of the Week.

Two quarterbacks are in the shuffle for the Huskies — Clarzell Pearl [71 completions, 860 yards] and Jim Murphy [55–115, 578]. The backfield is led by 5–foot 7–inch Brian Vaughn [1339 carries, 525 yards].

The Minutemen offense continue to be led by the ground game, ranked ninth in the nation [246.9 yards per game]. All–America candidate Rene Ingoglia is

Two games at Mullins for hockey team

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hockey team [0–3] faces its first non–conference opponents this weekend in the two opening games at the Mullins Center.

Tonight at 7 p.m., the Colgate Red Raiders [2–0] of the ECAC invade the Olympic–size rink at Mullins, and they have already knocked off two Hockey East clubs, Merrimack and the University of Massachusetts–Lowell.

The Union Skating Dutchmen [0–1], also a member of the East's other power conference, are in town Saturday for another 7 p.m. faceoff.

This evening's match is a renewal of a rivalry that dates back to 1933. And it has been 61 years since the Minutemen topped their fellow maroon and white–clad foes. Colgate leads the all time series, 10–1, but the teams have not played since the 1974–75 season.

This year's edition of the Red Raiders is a deep and talented entry. It includes 19 returning lettermen from last season's 14–17–2 [10–10–2 ECAC, 7th] team that fell to Clarkson in the ECAC Tournament quarterfinals.

"These are two very good games to find out where we stand," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "In [college] basketball, you get four or five 'warm–up' games before you hit the iron, but we're hitting the iron every game."

Colgate seeks offense from its two top right–wingers, sophomore Mike Harder [21 goals, 25 assists, 46 points] and senior captain Ron Fogarty [13–30–43]. Harder was named to the ECAC All–Rookie team for 1993–94, and the Lowell victory was the 100th game of Fogarty's fine career [37–69– 106]. Fogarty leads the team in scoring this year [3–1–4].

"[Colgate's] very quick up front," Mallen said. "And this is the time when I think Union's program will really hit a good stride."

The Hockey News reports the defense expected the return of Brad Dexter, who was an essential rearguard three years ago when he scored 19 points. He played only 12 games in 1992–93 before experiencing academic problems, and sat out all of last year. He was cleared to play this season, but fractured his ankle when it was hit by a puck in practice.

Colgate head coach Don Vaughan has sufficient blueliners to compensate for Dexter's absence. The key replacement is Jason Craig [2–9–11], one of three senior defensemen. Colgate's defense boasts a total of nine returnees.

Though goaltenders Jason Gates and Matt Weder started 30 of Colgate's 33 games last year, freshman Dan Brenzavich [Thunder Bay, Ontario] got the call in the Red Raiders' opening two contests. He saved 48 of 54 shots, good for an 88.8 save percentage and a 3.00 goals against average in the 6–4 win over the Warriors and the 5–2 defeat of the Riverhawks.

Neither team has scored a power play goal in 1994–95, as UMass is 0–for–21 and Colgate is 0–for–11.

Minutewomen to host two tough teams this weekend in GW and West Virginia

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

"There's no time to mess around," said University of Massachusetts volleyball coach Bonnie Kenny.

With only five games left before they head to the Atlantic 10 Tournament, Kenny's squad will prepare to host two formidable conference opponents this weekend. On Friday, the West Virginia Mountaineers will travel to the Curry Hicks Cage, and on Saturday, the league–leading George Washington Colonials will pay the Minutewomen a visit. Both contests are at 7 p.m.

UMass, sporting a stellar 21–3 overall record and 7–3 in the A–10, currently stands in third place in the conference, and are battling it out with the Temple Owls, whom they defeated last Saturday for the No. 3 seed in the tournament.

"We have to focus on playing West Virginia first, and not look ahead," Kenny said. "Temple has beaten [West Virginia] twice, so it is an important match that could determine our seeding."

The Mountaineers are 9–20 overall, and their 3–7 A–10 mark is good for sixth in the conference, putting them in line for a tournament spot. UMass defeated West Virginia

Minutewomen going for third A–10 title

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will try to win an unprecedented third–straight Atlantic 10 title this weekend as the top four teams in the conference will all vie for the conference title.

No. 1 Massachusetts versus No. 4 St. Joseph's

The quest for three in a row versus the quest for respect.

It has been a banner year for the St. Joseph's Hawks. A year ago, they were the conference cellar dwellers, not even qualifying for the A–10 tournament they were hosting, and finishing the season 8–9–1 overall.

Things have improved considerably this season for the Hawks. They have a 13–6–1 record on the season, including upsets over Delaware and Virginia.

The task ahead for the Hawks is a daunting one however. In their seven career meetings, the Hawks have never beaten UMass. When the two teams met at Totman Field last Saturday, the Minutewomen dominated the play but only scored once in their 1–0 victory.

"We know that we're the team that everybody's shooting for, because we have won two times in a row," Donnelly said. "I like that we are the favorite. We should be. If we play well, we'll do okay."

No. 2 Temple versus No. 3 Rutgers

When these two teams met on Oct. 22 at Rutgers, the Owls dominated throughout, pummelling the Lady Knights 5–2 on the strength of four goals in the first 10 minutes.

Temple has been on both ends of several blowouts throughout the season. The Owls rely on their high–scoring offense to make up for a subpar defense.

Rutgers has played with a more defensive mentality, which they displayed in a 0–0 tie with UMass.

"That tie was a career accomplishment for some of our kids," Rutgers Coach Anna Petracco said. "We hadn't beaten or tied UMass before."

Black students meet with Scott

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

In response to a local reporter having revealed the grades of Black student athletes to a journalism class last Tuesday, approximately 70 Black University of Massachusetts students met with Chancellor David K. Scott on Friday.

The meeting, organized by Black Student Union President Shomwa Shamapande and Vice-president Dan Lizana, was planned after Thursday's BSU meeting.

In a Media Criticism class early last week, Springfield Union News writer Brad Smith distributed a copy of the transcripts of the Black members of the men's basketball team, in addition to the GPAs of other Black male and female student athletes.

"For all of us who work so hard to be here, it's a slap in the face," Shamapande said. "There was a young lady [in the meeting] who was virtually in tears. This isn't only an athletics issue. If it's an injustice, it affects us all."

Before speaking with the chancellor, Black students assembled at New Africa House to discuss the situation with Assistant Athletic Director Mike Jenkins and to obtain reactions from student athletes in attendance. Jenkins fielded questions for about half an hour and was in agreement with the students that Smith's actions were improper.

Shamapande said the preliminary talk was conceived as "a general outreach to Black students, especially the athletes."

Later, the students grouped to walk over to Whitmore Administration Building to commence discussion with Scott.

Among the other administrators present were Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Thomas Robinson, Deputy Vice Chancellor Marcellette Williams, Deputy Provost Norman Aitken, and Assistant Vice Chancellor of Campus Activities M. Ricardo Townes.

Declaring that he was "speaking on behalf of students who cannot speak", Shamapande led off the meeting. Explaining his opening remark by saying that many Black student athletes fear University backlash, Shamapande then lay the blame for this uncomfortable feeling on Scott.

Shamapande went on to reveal that a list of demands drawn up the previous evening would be read later in the meeting by Lizana. He said the demands would be centered around establishing "a conducive environment for academic excellence."

Shamapande closed by saying that amongst some Blacks, cries of building takeovers or burnings had emerged, but had been calmed for the time being.

"We come here as a last ditch effort. Let's see if there can be a silver lining around the dark cloud over UMass," Shamapande said.

Next to speak was Scott, who began by confessing his shame about the incident. He added that the search for the press leak was almost ready to start.

"We are proceeding with considerable speed and dispatch," Scott said of the investigation required by both federal and University laws, which is due to begin in about a week. "But we don't know who did it, and we don't know if we'll ever know."

Noting that it is a federal violation to release the grades, Scott also said that if a UMass employee did indeed distribute the materials, then "harsh treatment" would ensue. A review of University security systems and procedures is already underway, according to Scott.

Scott was followed by Aitken, who clarified the possible means by which Smith's source may have obtained the grades.

According to Aitken, there are two different types of transcripts, official and unofficial. Official transcripts are locked away and available only in the Registrar's Office; unofficial transcripts can be found in advisory offices, as well as the office of the Athletic Director.

By talking to students present in the class at which Smith lectured, Aitken said their descriptions of the document they saw fit those of an unofficial transcript.

Lizana was the final speaker of the afternoon, reading off the list of demands.

In an act to show that his words were not to be interrupted, Lizana refused to allow Scott to finish his sentences each time the chancellor tried to interject.

"We can talk afterwards, but there's not going to be discussion right now," Lizana said.

The demands, which are still in development, ranged from various funding needs to a request that Smith and his sources be fully prosecuted.

The meeting concluded with Lizana leaving the room with his hands cupped over his ears as Scott replied to the list. Approximately half of the students took the same course of action.

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team celebrate after winning the Atlantic 10 tournament championship yesterday afternoon at Garber Field.

Band sells enough magazines to win 'wet' bet

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

On the losing end of a bet, the Minuteman Marching Band Director George N. Parks leaped into the campus pond Friday night.

"I made a bet with the band that they couldn't sell $25,000 worth of magazines, and I lost," said Parks. "They've been trying to get me in the pond for the past six years, but this is the first band that could do it."

According to Greg Bibeau, fund raising manager for the marching band, the students receive a "magazine kit" before they come to school, and the band gets 40 percent of the merchandise sold.

"We're talking about moving and feeding 250 people," Bibeau said. "That's almost $900 a meal at McDonalds. Plus we use six buses and a truck for every trip."

Parks said they do get money from the administration, and a big portion form the alumni.

"The University takes good care of us," Parks said. "But you can never get all the funding you need."

According to Parks, the money from the fund raising event is used for equipment, instruments and trips, but it is because of the band members themselves the expenses are not higher than they could be.

"Most bands sleep in hotels when they travel," said Parks. "This band sleeps on gym floors and has three dollar meals at McDonald's. They will do anything to show they are one of the best bands in the United States."

> "I made a bet with the band that they couldn't sell $25,000 worth of magazines, and I lost."

According to Leah Slack, a four year band member and graduating senior, most of the band members love making the sacrifices.

"It's the best part of the band," Slack said. "It's a huge party with all of your closest friends."

Slack said she felt the only problem with the band is not being able to hold a job and march at the same time.

"Recruiting is always a challenge," Parks said. "People have to have jobs, it's either play in the band or have a job."

Parks said he would like to see scholarships enter the band in the future, so it would not be as necessary to hold a job at the same time.

There may not be large band scholarships, but according to Bibeau, there are incentives to selling a lot of magazines. Anyone who sells 20 magazines gets a stadium blanket. This year only one met that mark, freshman education major Jim West.

Bibeau said the last time the band met the fund raising goal, causing Parks to jump in the pond was 1988.

"We've been waiting a long time for him to go into the drink," West said.

To the chants of "get Parks wet" he entered the pond decked out in a wet suit, goggles, and a toy boat.

Parks said next year he should set the goal to $80,000.

Car smashes into telephone pole on North Pleasant St.

AMHERST — Saturday afternoon a car smashed into a telephone pole on North Pleasant Street, causing extensive damage to the car and injuring the driver.

The Amherst Police Department said information was not available yesterday afternoon, but the report would be released today.

Bystanders said the car, a green Mustang, was travelling on Phillips Street at approximately 2:45 p.m. towards North Pleasant Street and crashed into a telephone pole opposite Phillips Street on North Pleasant Street.

Witnesses said there were three people in the car. The driver had lacerations to the head, according to police officials. Bystanders said the driver was bleeding profusely from the head. An ambulance responded to the scene.

It is not determined if there were other injuries.

Bystanders said the car appeared to be speeding, but the cause of the accident has not yet been determined.

The North Pleasant Street section where the accident occurred was closed and traffic was re-routed while officials moved the smashed car off the street.

The telephone pole was still standing, but had several dents and bits of paint on it.

The front end of the Mustang was compressed in towards the body of the car. The car's muffler was laying on the ground about three feet behind the car on the ground. The windshield was exploded on the car.

The car, unable to be towed, was pulled onto the flatbed of a truck from College Street Motors to be moved.

Rides available for voting students

Chauffeur service set to help students get to polling stations

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts community are so determined to have students vote, a chauffeur service will be set up throughout the day.

Voting stations for tomorrow's election will be scattered around Amherst, some being several miles from the University. Each residential area on campus is part of a precinct in Amherst and have a certain location for students to cast their votes.

Matt Pavesi of the Commuter Area Government said riders will be on hand from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m. to pick students up at their residence, drive them to the polls and drop them off anywhere in the Amherst area.

Many of the polls do not offer parking and many be difficult to get to without a car, Pavesi said. Some of the polling stations are also in obscure places in town which students may have difficulty in finding.

Over 2,000 students are registered to vote in Amherst. Of those students, Pavesi said over 340 have made appointments to be taken to the polls by a volunteer driver. Pavesi said all students registered to vote in Amherst have been contacted by phone, but he said reservations may be made any time to arrange for a ride.

> Over 2,000 students are registered to vote in Amherst. Of those students, Matt Pavesi said over 340 have made appointments to be taken to the polls by a volunteer driver.

Pavesi said the goal set is to have 95 percent student voter turnout in tomorrow's election. He said in the past, the turnout has been about 90 percent.

In the upcoming election, there are several ballot questions which Pavesi said will be important in determining the future of the University.

Polling stations will be at various locations in town. Students must find the area their residence falls in and vote at that particular precinct.

Residents of the North East and Sylvan areas will vote at the Congregational Church behind Furcolo Hall.

Residents of Orchard Hill Residential Area and Van Meter Residential Hall will vote at the north fire station which is at the top of the hill from Sylvan Residential Area on East Pleasant Street.

Central Residential Area, except Van Meter Residential Hall, will vote at Wildwood School on Strong Street behind Butterfield Residential Hall.

All of the Southwest Residential Area will vote at the Bangs Community Center in the center of town.

The off-campus living areas in the vicinity of Puffton Village and Brandywine Apartments will vote at the church across the street from Daisy's Restaurant. All south points of Amherst will vote at Crocker Farm School on Rte. 116.

Areas near Belchertown Road, including Colonial Village and Echo Hill will vote at the Fort River School on Northeast Street. All points in the center of town will vote at the Bangs Community Center.

Several other efforts will be made throughout the day tomorrow to have registered students go to vote. Pavesi said there will be a phone bank throughout the day to call students and remind them to vote.

There will also be volunteers walking throughout campus and the residence halls all day to offer students rides to the polls and to encourage students to vote.

Absentee ballots should be sent in so they will be received by 5 p.m. tomorrow.

Anyone interested in a ride to the polls and back should call 545-2145.

Market Reports

Compiled by Andrew Ferguson

Dollar falls due to lack of FED support

NEW YORK (AP) —The dollar declined Friday, following the direction of the stock and bond markets, as the Federal Reserve refrained from supporting the U.S. currency after two straight days of intervention.

Foreign exchange traders took their cue from other U.S. financial markets, which reacted negatively to news on the nation's employment situation.

Stocks skidded, with the Dow Jones industrial average losing more than 37 points, while the yield on the key 30 1/4-year Treasury bond jumped to 8.16 percent from 8.10 percent late Thursday. The dominant influence on the markets was the Labor Department report that the jobless rate fell to 5.8 percent in October from 5.9 percent a month earlier even though the number of new jobs didn't expand as much as expected.

Stocks fall again due to computerized trading

NEW YORK (AP) — Stock prices skidded Friday for the fourth time this week, weakened by inflation fears and rising yields in the bond market.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 38.36 to 3,807.52, pushing its weekly loss to 123.14 points, the biggest weekly decline in more than two months.

The closely watched blue-chip gauge rose 23 points early in the session and remained in positive territory throughout the morning. But it began declining in early afternoon as bond prices deteriorated, pushing yields higher.

Crops make gains from Chinese demand

CHICAGO (AP) — Expectations for strong soybean oil demand from China drove soybean futures prices moderately higher Friday on the Chicago Board of Trade. Most grain futures also rose.

Soybean oil is trading near a four-month high due to strong world demand for food oils and tight supplies of Malaysian palm oil, the main competitor to soybean oil on the world market. Analysts expect a large increase in Chinese buying as that nation's economy expands.

Correction

The Collegian reported Last Thursday's article on a lecture given by a Boston University professor misidentified Stephen Green, a minister in Springfield who is from the Church of Christ. Green was also quoted as saying Christ members have been approached by UMass police and professors. Green was actually referencing incidents at BU, not UMass. The Collegian regrets the errors.

In Friday's article about a Hudson River project worked on by UMass students, Mary Gerger was incorrectly identified as a student coordinator of the project. She is not involved in the Hudson River project and her comments were in reference to her work on a study on the Connecticut River. The Collegian regrets the errors.

Shopping mall bans smoking

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Glenn Serpa, of Florence, enjoys a cigarette in the Food Court at the Hampshire Mall. A smoking ban will soon be enacted.

By Heather Redfern
Collegian Staff

Cigarette smoking will be banned in the Hampshire Mall in Hadley as of Dec. 1, 1994.

A decrease in air quality, as well as customer requests to prohibit smoking in the mall, have prompted the decision to make the center a smoke free environment.

With the exception of reserved sections in the Ground Round Restaurant and Friendly's Ice Cream Restaurant, all other areas of the mall will ban cigarette smoking.

"We are concerned with the quality of the air," Anthony Alessi, marketing director of the Hampshire Mall Center said. "The air quality has decreased in the past few years."

According to Alessi, a large number of smokers are attracted to the center because at the present time it is the only remaining mall in Western Massachusetts that permits smoking.

"We attract an overabundance of smokers," Alessi said.

The decision to ban cigarette smoking from the mall has been a topic discussed by the center's directors during the past three months, Alessi said.

"It was a decision made on the mall level here," Alessi said.

A recent increase in personal requests as well as written comment cards asking for cigarette smoking to be banned were used as deciding factors to go through with the ban Alessi said.

In a survey of 400 customers, 68 percent of the customer population wanted no smoking Alessi said.

"I hate the smell of [cigarette smoke]," Deanna Jones a 13-year-old Hatfield student said.

"I think the ban will be good because I am trying to quit smoking, but my friends won't be happy," Kyle Tobin, an 18-year-old Greenfield resident said.

Alessi said he does not think the smoking ban will hurt business at the center.

"We may lose some people who come in regularly," Alessi said.

Signs, door decals and business cards will be used to prevent cigarette smoking in the mall Alessi said.

Alum speaks on peace in Ireland

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Although previous attempts at peace in Ireland have been made, the Irish Republican Army's cease fire on Aug. 31 marked a step towards increased realism and progress, according to Kevin Cullen, the Ireland correspondent for the Boston Globe.

Cullen, a University of Massachusetts alumn, spoke Thursday evening at Memorial Hall on the IRA's recent cease fire and other issues surrounding the turmoil in Ireland. Approximately 40 people attended.

"It's not about land. It's about national identity, but it's not worth blood shed," Cullen said.

The recent ceasefire stands apart from previous attempts, because it is the first time the IRA has come out and said that politics ought to take precedence over militarism, Cullen said.

Ireland is currently working at resolving years of internal warfare, by either splitting off into two entirely different countries or finding a way to unify the north and south, he said.

"The challenge is getting all members of the Irish parties to respect each other," Cullen said.

With Catholics in the minority, still targeted by the Protestants, and British intervention at large, people continue to look over their shoulders in distrust, he said.

The loyalists in Ireland are still paranoid, even if the republicans have vowed to cease fire, Cullen said.

"The loyalists don't know what they want," he said. "They hate the British, because they think they sold them out, but they still want to be called British."

Much of the blame of Ireland's problems is put on the shoulders of Britain, according to Cullen.

"It's easy to beat up on the Brits, but the Irish government's gotten a free ride, and been just as hostile toward the republicans, as the British have," Cullen said.

The sectarian division of Ireland that provoked the IRA to raise arms in 1969, has resulted in 3,000 senseless deaths, the majority of which were civilians, he said.

"It has become a small place," Cullen said. "I started running into problems because all my best sources kept getting killed."

He said though it may be small, people continue to remain isolated.

At this point, Ireland is like an "island of strangers." Mure people from Southern Ireland have traveled to America and Britain, than have seen the northern part of their own country, Cullen said.

"They want to go north, but the perception is that it's a warzone, a killing field."

Norman Sims, a journalism professor at UMass, said that Cullen is one of our most prominent graduates and the Globe's best policc reporter.

Cullen graduated from UMass in 1981 with a degree in journalism, and spends an average of one month a year reporting from Ireland.

"The Globe had its eyc on Kevin thc day he graduated," Sims said. "He's done an extraordinary piece of reporting for the last eight years."

Red Sox GM pays a visit to campus

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

One of the brightest young minds in baseball returned to the Pioneer Valley on Friday.

Dan Duquette, general manager of the Boston Red Sox, and 1980 graduate of Amherst College, spoke to a crowd of sport management students and faculty Friday morning as part of the sport management guest speaker program.

Duquette focused on internships and the importance of experience in gaining a job in professional sports.

"It is important to meet people that can help you develop skills," Duquette said. "Even if you are performing the most mundane of tasks, you are still getting your foot in the door and gaining experience."

After graduating Amherst College, Duquette began an internship with the Milwaukee Brewers scouting department in 1981. He slowly worked his way up and eventually accepted a position as assistant general manager with the Montreal Expos organization in 1987.

Duquette became the general manager of the Expos in 1991, and when the Red Sox offered him the opportunity to return to New England last year, he accepted, taking over the reigns in Boston.

"Having Dan here is a tremendous boost for the program," said UMass Dean of Sports Studies Glenn Wong, who also stood at a podium and presented questions to the Boston G.M. "It is important to give the students the opportunity to hear from one of the brightest young executives in sports, and hear his philosophies."

Duquette also spoke about the baseball strike that has forced America to be without a World Series for the first time since 1904.

"There is now pressure from Washington on both sides," Duquette said. "Federal Mediator Bill Usery will meet with both parties next week. (Boston Red Sox owner) John Harrington is very involved with the negotiations, and his goal is a long term contract."

"We thought that there was a deal right before the playoffs were cancelled, but it fell through. If a deal is not reached by December 1 then I expect both parties to explore other options."

Duquette also said that if the current immunity that baseball has from antitrust laws was repealed, it would be disastrous to minor league baseball.

"Currently owners pump about $10 million a year into player development. The Players Association wants to repeal the antitrust exemption, so that the money that gets put into the minors could go towards salaries. If that happens, it would be devastating to a community with minor league baseball," he said.

Duquette discussed some of the differences between working in Montreal and Boston, "In Montreal the goal was just to be competitive and put the best team we could on the field. In Boston, the goal is to win a World Championship. The fans have been waiting for one since 1918. There are more resources in Boston, but the expectations are much higher as well."

Bosnian war victims benefit from concert

By Adam Ratliner
Collegian Correspondent

The Friends of Bosnia's concert last week will help collect funds for food and medical supplies drive for war victims Bosnian.

Local musicians featured at the concert included Amy Fairchild, Justina & Joyce and Erica Wheeler.

"Most of the civilian population of Bosnia–Herzegovina is under siege and reliant on the outside aid for even basic human needs," said Sharon Webb, co-director of the Friends of Bosnia. "Because their suffering is no longer front page news, many nations, including the United States, have cut back on relief supplies. Our aid drive will contribute substantially to the well-being of some of the neediest Bosnia's war victims."

Fairchild sang a song about her mother, who she said passed away very recently. She said, "I'm counting angels, 'cause I'm through with sheep."

Peter Nelson and Chris Haynes played the piano.

Nelson's music was folksy with a touch of rock. Haynes said he was not used to performing in public.

Justina and Joyce sang very strong harmonies. Justina sang, "Ancient Mother, I hear you calling, I hear your song. I feel your laughter, I taste your tears." Joyce wrote the words. Justina and Joyce play in Northampton regularly.

Radislav Lokavic, born in Croatia, ran on stage, and without saying a word, began to pound his melodious music on the piano.

With his long hair in his face he sang without speaking more than three sentences.

Friends of Bosnia hopes to collect and ship 10 tons of essential food and medical supplies to civilian war victims in Bosnia.

A number of religious groups and community groups are co-sponsoring the drive. Last week's concert was the main fundraising event for the Friends of Bosnia aid drive.

Collection boxes for food in Amherst can be found at Victory Supermarket, the Newman Center, Brooks Pharmacy in north Amherst, the Camera Shop, Food For Thought Bookstore, and the Bangs Community Center.

Mt. Holyoke student elected treasurer for Hillel

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

The Hillel council at the University of Massachusetts unanimously elected a new treasurer this week.

Lynne Wolfson was elected the new treasurer, replacing Dror Niv. Niv said he resigned his position due to a personal conflict.

Asked about how this would affect the dynamics of the executive officers, Hillel President Nurit Ben-Harav said that they are a "cohesive group who can work well together and get stuff done." Hillel's other officers are Ron Gonen, the vice-president, and Lori Rapaport, the secretary.

Wolfson is a student at Mount Holyoke College, who is visiting UMass for the year. At Mount Holyoke, Wolfson sat on the executive board for the Jewish Student Union, and acted as a representative for that body to the Student Government Association. Wolfson was also co-organizer of Israeli Awareness Week, which was held at Mount Holyoke last year.

Wolfson has also spent two and a half years in Israel in high school, college, and on a kibbutz (farming communes that are common in Israel.)

Wolfson said, she came here because of the strong Jewish community, which she has found while living in Hillel House's Jewish living community.

At UMass, Wolfson served as co-chair of the Student Alliance For Israel.

"She has a lot of experience. . . and she's very excited about Hillel in general," Ben-Harav said. "She'll do a great job."

"I'd like to work with the Jewish community to make it even better and more inclusive for all types of Jewish students," Wolfson said. "Being on the executive board, I'd like to strengthen Hillel's make-up to include people of all backgrounds regardless of their level of religious observance or political views. . . now we're starting a Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Jewish group on campus under the leadership of [Hillel outreach coordinator] Paul [Entis]. Hillel and the Jewish Community needs to be welcoming of everyone. I'd like to strengthen it."

Life in the house that Jack built

Nathan Crick

Once upon a time there was a man named Jack. He built a house. It was the house that Jack built, and he was proud. Proud of his house, that he built. Jack became a media celebrity, and people sang songs of him and his homemade house. Then he lost his popularity, and people all over the country started building their own houses, and Jack became desolate and sold his house and moved to a flat in San Diego, and worked as a butcher.

His house was eventually bulldozed and a Walmart was built, which sold home improvement equipment that people would buy to build their own houses, which nobody sang about.

I have written too many things. I am tired. I am worn out.

So.

There I was, hanging out in Brandywine, and I heard a ruckus. Can you describe the ruckus, sir? There were people yelling and bumping into things in the hallway outside the door. I looked through the peephole and saw a big, laughing, drunken guy in a white shirt holding a door closed. Then a fist came through the window, shattering it quite nicely, and the door opened to let in a short, laughing, drunken guy, and they both walked down the stairs quite happily together.

Earlier that night we were watching the Celtics play and heard outside the balcony a couple of guys throw their beer bottles on the sidewalk. They cheered and gave each other high fives. They then proceeded to wrestle in front of their girlfriends, and stopped when one guy called out, "man, he's grabbin' my ball sack!" The inference of this act immediately sent the other man into spasms of machismo.

Um.

Felicia would dress up in lots of black clothes. She would wear heavy boots. She like swearing. She would go to parties and complain to her friends that nobody liked her there and she felt out of place. She was just too doggone alternative. One day, she went to a party filled with lots of swearing people in black clothes wearing heavy boots who liked to listen to classic rock. She complained to her friends that they were all a bunch of posers. And that she felt out of place.

She eventually moved into Jack's flat in San Diego, and she got a job working in his butcher shop. Jack, bitter but still with a sense of humor, would go to work dressed in black clothes and heavy boots and pretend he was on acid. He would complain to her that all the shades of green did not like him, and he felt out of place with all the parsley leaves screaming at him. It would make Felicia think he hated her. Jack would laugh.

Er.

I wanted to get away this weekend so me and some friends drove east. We drove to Salem, and petted goats at a petting zoo, and got pulled over by a cop, and ate roast beef, and came home. It was very exciting. I had an epiphany. Then I watched the Celtics.

The days are just packed.

Under the crescent moon, whispers of grass brushing out legs, the cool chills of misty waters coming off the pond as we walk into the silent gravestones. Rustles above, the smell of damp earth, the sight of inscriptions by the inconstant lighter flame, pausing to look up into a hazy sky to imagine places and times, far away.

Thinking comes clearer when you are There, and not Here.

Hm.

Beauty had to get away. The Beast had become so cocky now that he was a man again. Looking in the mirror, flirting with all the girls again, drinking too much whiskey. He was better when everyone hated him. It gave him character. Plus, she had to admit, she kind of liked falling asleep in his fur at night. His grumbling breaths soothed her to sleep. Now he just belched and never liked to just relax anymore. All he ever wanted was sex.

Beauty said to hell with it, and jumped on a train.

She went out to San Diego, as she heard there was a boarding house that had opened up called Jack's Place. Some guy had apparently bought up some big old house and converted in into comfortable and temporary housing. It even had a nice espresso bar in the glass enclosed porch. She loved it.

Jack and his wife were fun. Sometimes they would change clothes and pretend they were each other. Felicia would come in and drink wine with her and talk about books and people and life. Jack would spend a lot of time building things out of toothpicks and popsicle sticks. And after he was finished, he'd put a little sign out in front that said something like "The Toothpick Thing that Jack built."

Then he would give it away.

Sometimes, when he built a real big one, he'd bring it out back and set it in a stone circle, and call everyone out. After giving everyone a cappucino, he'd set his construction on fire, and him and Felicia would stand arm in arm, wearing each other's clothes, watching it burn.

Beauty thought it was the ugliest thing she'd ever seen.

It made her so happy.

Discovering yourself in the mirror

Geri Sahn

As I walked across campus today, I looked at my reflection every chance I could. I could see my body in the glass doors, and windows of the buildings. When the sun was shining I looked at my shadow. When I approached Bartlett Hall, like I do several times a day, everyday, I looked at my thighs through the reflection of the doors. Before every class, I run to the bathroom to see if my stomach got any bigger since the last time I looked; an hour ago. And as I approached the Student Union at lunch time I asked myself whether I really needed to eat, even though I was hungry.

I am not anoretic, I am not bulemic, I am not overweight, but like so many people on campus, I have a psychological weight problem. But compared to last year, my obsession with my weight has become a lot less intense.

Last semester I would punish myself for eating lunch by not eating dinner. I was caught up in an endless cycle of counting fat and calories. I was very much aware of my obsession with weight, and I actually became exhausted with thinking about it all of the time. So in search of some healing, I decided to go to Mental Health Services on campus. I made my appointment, which had to be made several weeks in advance, and was very excited to talk to someone.

My experience was a very discouraging one. I sat in an office and told "my story" to a woman. She sat there motionless, like most psychologist do, I suppose, while I cried, and talked, and tried to come to some understanding of why I was so obsessed with my weight. After my hour session, the woman looked at me and said, "well, honey, you're not starving yourself and you are not purging up your food, so I don't know how I can really help you. Why don't you call a nutritionist at Health Services."

I walked away very angry. I told everyone that the mental health services on campus are worthless, and that they don't care about anyone unless they are physically sick. I didn't want a nutritionist to put me on a diet; I knew I wouldn't follow it. What I wanted was someone to go into my head and erase all of the obsessions I had with my body.

I was always athletic and in shape, my parents never enforced a strict diet on me, and people have never said I was overweight. My problem was just that I wanted to be something that I wasn't — five feet tall and weighing 100 pounds.

After a good summer of "healing" — dieting and exercising — I now have a good, healthy diet. At least I like to think so. I have come to the understanding that I will never be considered "skinny," but I know that I am not "fat." I still do constantly look at my reflection, but when I am hungry, I eat. I finally learned what the word moderation meant. It's the word that I now live by.

Thinking back at it now, I know that there really wasn't anything mental health services could have done for me. There is nothing anyone can do for me. My friends will never understand. They will tell me that I am thin, my parents will tell me I am thin. My dream man could tell me I am thin, but I will not be satisfied. It is something I have to deal with myself. But I am going to deal with it.

A weight problem should not, and can not be ignored. It can not be solved by other people telling you that you look good. It can not be solved by starving yourself. It can only be solved by finally coming to terms with who you are, and who you will never be.

Cutting down on the toolbox factor

Looking ahead to my next and last semester at UMass, I find myself also looking back at the past three years, and wondering how I got involved in enough activities to warrant some kind of school spirit award.

Every semester seems to bring with it a certain amount of stress, but the fact that lately I am so busy that I forget to go to the bathroom seems to sum up what the past two months has been like for me. Before you bust out your violin to accompany my sob story, I acknowledge the multitude of stressed-out students who currently share my anxiety.

I think back to my first year, when most of my desire to partake in extracurricular activities involved drinking. Like every other freshperson, I was thrilled with Puffton parties and Hobart lane, suffocating Friday night busrides, and "90210" weekly boozing. By second semester, however, I was tired of feeling that "accompilishment" usually meant not being hungover both Saturday and Sunday morning.

Walking into the Collegian newsroom for the first time, it is easy to feel like the biggest toolbox on campus, but I accepted this as a necessary part of something greater to come. Three years later I'm still sucked down into the basement almost every day, though I haven't yet figured out quite why.

With a last name like mine, you almost have to join the Italian club. The club has always been small (thus cutting down on the toolbox factor) and the bulk of our activity happens every Friday morning, at a coffee/pastry table we run in Herter Hall. Members bake and sell goodies (banana bread is the most popular) and coffee to the noble, sleepy- eyed people who venture to campus on what some call the first day of the weekend.

Almost by default I find myself in charge of the club this year, and I therefore have to make sure that people bake stuff to sell and then show up to run the table. I also try to plan films and activities that are fun (food is usually involved) and that I have time to follow through with.

Last year the Comparative Literature department started mOthertongue, a multi-lingual journal in which students are able to express themselves in whatever language they choose. Guess who one of the editors was? Although I don't have the time to put as much effort into mOthertongue this year, I still meet with the new editors and offer them advice based on what we learned last year.

There is also a bunch of stuff that I have to do, along with a lot of other seniors. While some of us are working on (or worrying about) our resumes, others are inquiring about and applying to graduate schools. Not only does the latter involve figuring out what you want to do for the next two years (as a segue to the "rest of your life"), it involves a lot of writing, begging for recommendations and stressing about GREs. I won't even get into the GRE anxiety that plagues me, but if you remember back to your SATs you'll have some idea of what I'm talking about.

Add one honors thesis about a man who is almost historically impossible to find, and you have pretty much the full body of reasons that my bladder suffers often.

Some days I wonder why I put all of my energy into things that I don't seem to get much out of, save a headache by the end of the day. I too often think of my commitments and responsibilities as things I must do; time and effort that I owe other people. I sometimes wonder when I will have time for me, to sit in front of the TV and guzzle a few beers, to meander into Northampton to simply hang.

I think back to my freshman year, when all I did was hang. I remember the rush I got when I finished writing my first story, the fun I had the first time I went to Carmelina's with the Italian club, the thrill of seeing mOthertongue in print, and the excitement of grad school window shopping.

It would be easy to go through four years of UMass much the same way I spent my first year; it might even seem fun. However, I don't think that this apathetic lifestyle merits fond memories of college.

Anyone who is passionate about something on this campus, whether it is being on an athletic team or playing in the marching band, is using these years wisely.

The people who get up every morning and go out and do are the people who are going to remember these years as the best ones of their life; not for the blur of carefree partying they did, but for developing the passion that helped them to evolve to the people that they will eventually become. They will realize that somewhere down the road, doing turned into being.

I guess my bladder can stand another semester of this.

Question 3 helps students

To the editor:

I was outraged when I read the Yes On 3 editorial in Wednesday's paper. The students of UMass voted to assess themselves a waivable fee on their tuition bill. Now we are told that we can't do it because we are too stupid to read out own tuition bill to see what we are paying for? Please, anyone who has been on this campus for the past year knows that we students are very serious when it comes to our tuition bill.

I would like to ask the editorial board to WAKE UP and take a look at who is supporting the Yes On 3 campaign. Associated Industries of Mass., Boston Edison, Society of the Plastics Industry, Browning Ferris Industries, (you may have seen their logos on the side of dumpsters) and Dow Chemical to name a few. Now ask yourselves, why are these companies funding the Yes On 3 campaign. Is it because Dow Chemicals is concerned about the students? I don't think so.

They have launched this attack on MASSPIRG because we get things done. MASSPIRG was instrumental in helping pass the Toxics Use Reduction Laws, State Wide Clean Air Act, the Bottle Bill, and many more.

MASSPIRG keeps an eye on companies and makes sure they are not scamming consumers or destroying our environment and that really pisses them off The companies supporting this bill would like nothing more than to have MASSPIRG out of their way so they can get back to business as usual.

MASSPIRG has nothing to hide. We need a valuable fee to pay the organizers who teach us, the students, how to organize and run effective campaigns on issues we care about. We cannot survive on donations. It is up to you, the students, to tell the government of Massachusetts and the companies like Dow Chemical and BFI that they cannot take away our voice. You can do this by voting No on question 3 on Nov. 8.

Aimee Doherty
Co-chair of MASSPIRG

Examining state questions

To the editor:

It is time Massachusetts had a graduated income tax. Questions 6 and 7 on the ballot for the Nov. 8 general election propose that the Massachusetts state income tax; which is currently levied at a flat rate regardless of income level, be changed to a graduated system. This means that taxpayers would be divided into separate income brackets, with the tax rate becoming progressively higher as income increases. Question 6 proposes the introduction of the necessary legislation, while Question 7 outlines the specific rates and income brackets which would be implemented.

Firstly, a graduated income tax system bases taxes on ability to pay. This is because it incorporates the idea of disposable income. This is income beyond that needed to buy basic necessities. Presuming that this is a reasonably static cost across income brackets, it follows that taxing those who earn more at a higher rate can only benefit the majority, as it does not impair the ability of the poorer percentage of the population to survive, nor does it harm the richer minority, for they have the money to spare.

Those arguing against this say that taxing everyone at the same rate spurs general economic growth, which is supposed to "trickle down" to benefit all. However, this only works if those who see the benefits of this practice first (the big businesses) invest this money, which is not taking place.

Secondly, the current flat rate system hinders changes in the area of tax policy. It effectively gives an individual from Massachusetts more of a tax break for starting a business in another state, than here where it would benefit the state. This seems to counteract vague claims that a graduated system would make Massachusetts "unfriendly" to business.

Thirdly, the shift to a graduated income tax system would benefit a majority of the residents of this state. The Weld Administration has calculated that 92 percent of state taxpayers would see their taxes decrease, while only 8 percent would see an increase; these being individuals earning in excess of $62,050, or couples earning in excess of $101,700. Furthermore, the introduction of these proposals would not give the legislature any power to raise taxes, and it does not affect local taxes.

A YES vote on Questions 6 and 7 is a vote for equality, fairness and progressiveness.

******

Few people recognize the magnitude of ballot Question 4. Question 4 limits the terms of State and U.S. Representatives, State and U.S. Senators, and the Governor. The fact is, we already have term limits. They are called elections. The initiative will not only weaken our state government, but will also weaken Massachusetts' position relative to other states in the Union.

Question 4 is a reactionary, oversimplistic solution to a non-existent problem. It assumes that voters are too stupid to make up their own mind, and ultimately rips at the very fabric of what we as a state have been working to create over the past few centuries — effective government.

Democracy provides a natural turnover of politicians. Only the best, and most desired by the voters, remain. From the 1986 to 1992 elections voters have replaced of 50 percent of the U.S. Congress and more that 70 percent of the state officers.

Not only are term limits not needed, they would inflict immeasurable harm upon Massachusetts. State representatives and senators have a complex job. It takes the average state legislator at least one term just to figure out the rules on Beacon Hill, let alone get anything done. Simply stated, legislators are more effective and can do greater things the longer they are in office.

As long as they have a consent of the voters, what is the problem? Term limits would result in a flock of rookie politicians that would be unable to work in the best interest of the state.

We must maintain natural term limits — through free elections. If you don't like the bums, vote them out. Prove to those who proposed Question 4 that you are not stupid.

Phish delivers at Mullins show

By Jonathan Ratcliff
Collegian Staff

PHISH
Mullins Center
Nov. 4

Slam together long improvisational jams, Strauss, AC/DC, trampolines, a capella, bluegrass, a quirky stage presence and a crazy light show, and you have Phish at the Mullins center last Thursday.

Sound strange? It is, but this is Phish's trademark. Phish has interests in so many genres of music that it seems that they can't pick one to stick with, so they have created their own sound to incorporate all of them.

To convincingly pull this off, a considerable amount of talent is needed (they have it), as well as a lot of playing time. Phish has been around for about 10 years, playing live for most of it with extensive national tours.

STEVE PEDULLA/COLLEGIAN
Trey Anastasio of Phish

This much time on the road has produced an ability to produce crowd pleasing shows with streamlined production and flawless playing. They are able to achieve this in large arenas like the Mullins as much as they did (minus the intimacy) in their former club and small theater venues.

They opened the show with their early classic "Fee," and went into another older song, "Divided Sky," which showed early in the show that Phish has mastered the art of manipulating the speed and timing of their instrumental grooves.

Snowballing momentum and odd timing changes are common aspects of these jams. They also put rests in that last too long, creating a strange tension in the awaiting crowd. Jumping back to the opening signature riff of the song is the typical conclusion of these jams. This formula applied to many of their songs throughout the show.

The show touched on Phish's wide variety of music styles– they opened the second set with their rendition Strauss's "Sunrise;" went on to country rock with "Poor Heart;" a punk parody called "Big Fat Furry Creature from Mars;" and a reggae song, "Harry Hood." And bassist Mike Gordon and lead singer/guitarist Trey Anastasio did their bouncing strobe light trampoline thing during "You Enjoy Myself."

If that wasn't enough variety for you, for the encore, they adorned acoustic instruments for a couple of bluegrass songs, complete with mandolin and banjo. Following this was an a capella rendition of "Amazing Grace." The last song? A loud cover of AC/DC's classic, "Highway to Hell."

As crazy as this mix may sound, it is nothing new for Phish. Mullins was no standout among Phish shows. But a Phish show stands, in itself, apart from any other live music act, and the very receptive area crowd appreciated it.

Censored film to be screened at forum

Titicut Follies, a 1967 documentary directed by Frederick Wiseman and John Marshall, will be shown this evening at 7:30 p.m. in Hampden Theater.

The controversial film was photographed at the Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Bridgewater, a prison hospital for the criminally insane and was the only American film censored for reasons other than obscenity or national security.

The film, released for general exhibition in 1991 by a court decision, is the first in a series of films in the "Banned On Campus: Responding to Censorship in the Visual Arts" forum.

Other films scheduled to be shown this and next week are Nitrate Kisses, Salt of the Earth and Damned in the USA.

Titicut Follies will be hosted by communications Professor Carolyn Anderson, whose 1991 book Documentary Dilemmas: Frederick Wiseman's 'Titicut Follies' (co–authored by Thomas W. Benson) detailed the legal entanglements and ethical questions surrounding this 'direct cinema' classic.

The event is free, though the organizers advise parental and individual discretion.

Helium, Polvo break indie stereotypes at UPC concert

By Michael Burke
Collegian Staff

HELIUM, POLVO
Bluewall Cafe
Nov. 4

Last Friday night, The Bluewall Cafe was the site of the first UPC sponsored concert of the semester. Two of the nation's most heralded indie rock bands, Helium and Polvo, were the featured performers while local rockers Meristem opened up.

The headlining band was deservedly the Boston based Helium. Although they have yet to release a full length album, the trio is quickly becoming one of the most talked about bands around. In their rather brief set in the Bluewall the group proved that they can live up to all the hype.

Guitarist/vocalist Mary Timony led the group through the entrancing ten song set, while drummer Shawn Devlin and bassist Ash Bowie (also of Polvo) managed to accent the songs with their solid rhythm section.

As always Timony's unconventional guitar playing added with her whisper-like vocals were the foundation of Helium's sound, but surprisingly Ash Bowie's bass–playing added a noisier element to their sound which has not been heard on their recordings.

Not too many bands could pull off a show that featured almost all unreleased material but that is just what Helium did. The only two known songs were "XXX" and "I'll Get You, I Mean It" both from their Pirate Prude EP released earlier this year on Matador. Most of the new songs will be featured on their upcoming full length release which is due out early next year.

North Carolina's Polvo also put on an impressive set of their noisy and abrasive duel guitar assault, proving that they are one of the most innovative guitar bands out there today today.

While many other guitar based bands are stuck on sounding like the next Sonic Youth, Polvo managed to create a sound that is truly all their own.

Many of the songs in Polvo's set were taken from their most recent release on Merge Records, Celebrate The New Dark Age EP. Among the standout tracks were "Fractured (Like Chandeliers)" and the title track to their EP.

Many critics of the indie rock scene claim that many of the scene's bands sound too much alike. This show should silence all of those critics. Both Polvo and Helium successfully displayed their own unique sounds that distinguish them from all of their peers.

Unfortunately the opening band, Meristem lacked the originality of the other two bands. Their set was filled with trademark loud guitars backed with Eddie Vedder–like vocals. A

Neck injury sidelines Rose

By Mike Pinder
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — University of Massachusetts goaltender Hilary Rose has been released from Lankenau Memorial Hospital in Philadelphia after being treated for a fracture of her sixth vertebrae during the Atlantic 10 field hockey tournament yesterday.

Rose did not suffer any neurological damage but is currently wearing a neck brace.

"She is very, very lucky," said UMass Coach Megan Donnelly, after seeing Rose in the hospital.

"It's kind of scary," Temple goalie Deb Brown said. "It makes you more aware that you can get hurt out there."

Rose will miss any remaining post-season games for the Minutewomen.

Rose sustained the injury with 7:24 left in the second half with UMass trailing Temple University 1–0.

The incident occurred after Rose successfully stopped a penalty corner by Temple. After the save, a scramble in front of the net ensued. Temple University's Tara Silvestre got her stick tangled between the legs of Rose and then forearmed her to the head, in an attempt to free it. The blow caused Rose to fall over backwards, landing on the back of her neck.

The injury comes at a bad time for the Minutewomen, who will likely play their first NCAA tournament game on Thursday. Backup goalie Stacy Walker will be called upon to keep UMass's postseason chances alive.

After redshirting her first season, Walker has played in three games during her collegiate career at UMass. She has started in only one of those games, [on Oct. 10, 1993], shutting out the St. Joseph's Hawks 4–0.

"I've always been ready," said Walker. "I play behind the best in the nation."

"We have complete confidence in Stacy," said senior Colleen Duffy. "She's just never gotten a chance."

Rose had been stellar all season recording an impressive .34 goals against average entering the tournament.

Just two days earlier, Rose was named the 1994 Atlantic 10 Player of the Year. Rose had lived up to her billing, playing superbly in UMass's 2–1 first round win against St. Joseph's. In that game Rose recorded 14 saves leading the Minutewomen past the Hawks.

Sunday's game was not the first time Rose has been manhandled by opponents. On Saturday against St. Joe's, Rose received several cheap shots from Julie Salmon. The normally composed Rose charged after Salmon pushing her in the back. The squabble was quickly broken up and the game resumed.

"I was laying on the floor and the girl came in and hit me once on the head and twice on the stomach," Rose said. "Every time I go down, I'm being hit two or three times. I'm getting fed up with not getting protection from the umpires."

Donnelly supported her goalie's actions.

"I don't blame her," said Donnelly of Rose's outburst. "She's been getting hit and taunted all year long. I told the officials that just because she has equipment on it doesn't mean people have the right to run at her."

early on in the season when Massachusetts defeated the Mountaineers 1–0, the Minutemen won a surprisingly lopsided game 5–1.

Massachusetts was led by forward Dave Siljanovski, who scored one goal and had one assist. Siljanovski got plenty of help from his teammates. Johnson got the Minutemen's first goal at 11:27 by taking a cross from defender Benny Sheally and heading the ball into the net.

The next six minutes of the game saw Siljanovski and Butler each score goals. West Virginia's Todd Gispert got the Mountaineers their lone score 58:28. But this goal was answered by two more Massachusetts scores. The first score was by midfielder Mike Doyle unassisted at 75:54. The second goal was scored by forward Hossein Giahi off of a pass from midfielder Kevin Martin to make the final score 5–1.

6:32, beating Regan with a slapshot, which set up Greg Lewis and Clayton McCaffrey as Colgate worked the puck around the UMass end.

"We can't start off like that, we shot ourselves in the foot," Mallen said. "Without having experience, [the 3–0 deficit] really hurts."

Colgate recorded the only goal of the second period as Ron Fogarty stood alone in front of Regan and slid an Earl Cronan pass to put Colgate up 4–0. UMass had plenty of opportunities, but the Minutemen failed on four power–play chances. Until scoring a power–play goal against Union, UMass was 0 for 29 on the power–play.

"I don't understand it, I've never had this much trouble with a power–play before," Mallen said.

After Cronan [one goal, two assists] scored the fifth Colgate goal, UMass' Rob Bonneau tallied the only Minuteman goal. Bonneau scored on a beautiful one–on–one effort with goaltender Dan Brenzavich [24 saves].

Against Union, the story of the night was the Dutchmen's Chris Albert, who registered three goals. His first came at 2:20 into the game, finishing off a play set up by Seabrook Satterlund and Russell Monteith.

The Minutemen then came roaring back, with Warren Norris knotting the score at 4:19. Norris' goal was the first power–play goal of the season, ending the 0 for 29 start.

The UMass power–play clicked again in the first stanza as Bonneau scored his fourth goal of the year. Bonneau was alone in front of the net, scoring off a Tom Perry [two assists] feed. The power–play connected on two of 10 chances [2–39 on season].

Union turned it on in the second period. Chris Ford tied it at 15:15 of the second on the power–play. The Dutchmen then burned UMass for two more quick goals. Craig Reckin beat goaltender Dave Kilduff with a quick wrist–shot at 15:40, followed by Albert's second goal at 17:10.

Albert completed the hat trick at 2:18 of the third period for the sixth Union goal. Tom Sheehan scored for UMass at 3:03 of the third to provide the 6–3 final.

Mallen and the team were unavailable for comment, refusing to talk to the press after the Union loss.

Minutewomen sustained their first A–10 loss since 1991.

The UMass players were frustrated following the game, not because of their play but because they thought they outplayed the Owls.

"It's frustrating because we were the better team," Duffy said. "It was the story of our year. We couldn't put the ball in the net."

"I think we played well," UMass Assistant Coach Amy Robertson said. "We had opportunities but the ball just kept missing the net. I give Temple a lot of credit. They played a great game against us."

UMass Head Coach Megan Donnelly was not available for comment following the game because she left immediately to be with Rose at the hospital.

On Friday the Minutewomen defeated host St. Joseph's 2–1 to advance to the finals. Massachusetts sophomore Kyle Rothenberger and St. Joe's senior Hayley Davidson both scored on penalty strokes to knot the game at 1–1.

With :08 remaining in the first half, Duffy fed junior Streya Volla a perfect pass, which she drilled home to give UMass the win.

The loss will considerably change the NCAA playoff picture for the Minutewomen. The loss will probably not eliminate them from the tournament but will clearly decrease their seed. A win would have almost assured UMass a home playoff game, and if certain teams were upset, the Minutewomen could have received a first round bye. According to several players however, taking to the road could be a blessing in disguise.

"It might be good for us," Hart said. "If we have to play away, we might play on turf. We're more comfortable on turf than we are on grass."

UMass will find out how much affect the loss had when tournament pairings are announced this afternoon. The tournament's first round begins this Tuesday.

Six Minutewomen earned Atlantic 10 Conference awards at the annual banquet Friday night. Rose was chosen as the conference's MVP. Seniors Danielle Borges, Duffy and Hart, and sophomores Rothenberger and Rose were selected for the All–Conference team. Senior back Kyri Sparks was also named to the Honorable Mention squad.

The second half was an entirely different story. Northeastern opened up with a Brandon Hanes 32–yard field goal. A 32–yard pass by Murphy to Tony Monios set up a one–yard Murphy TD pass to Jeff Reale. The two–point conversion brought the Huskies to within three, down just 20–17 halfway through the third quarter.

The Huskies took the lead at the start of the fourth quarter. Murphy dumped off a screen pass to running back Brian Vaughn, who broke to sideline, exploding 43 yards for the go–ahead touchdown.

Abandoning the passing offense, UMass ran the ball on 33 of its last 34 plays. A punt return by Breon Parker gave UMass the ball on the Northeastern 47 with 5:46 to play, setting up Ingoglia's second touchdown, the game winner.

"[The winning TD] was on the option, with a big opening to the left," Ingoglia said. "Credit the guys blocking in front of me."

"It was fourth down, and no doubt number 19 [Ingoglia] was getting the ball, and he delivered," Hodges said.

not where it needed to be to win."

"This is just going to motivate us, and make us want to work harder," said Nolan.

Friday night, UMass hosted a scrappy West Virginia squad [now 9–21, 3–8 A–10] that made the Minutewomen work hard to secure the victory in three games.

Nolan had a stellar game for UMass, leading the team in kills [16] and digs [15] while hitting for a .364 percentage.

"We hit the ball real well," Kenny said. "Lesley started off excellent, and Giza (15 kills) had excellent discipline with their blocking."

The middle blocking for UMass played well in this one. Freshmen Michelle Paciorek, who collected 10 kills, and Leigh Ready, who had a .400 hitting percentage, were in on six of the team's nine blocks.

Sideouts: The volleyball team finished the season a 14–2 in the Cage, setting a new record for home wins. The Minutewomen surpassed the old record of 10 shared by four different teams.

UMass will be in a action again Tuesday night when they travel to Holy Cross to tangle with the Crusaders.

through the air for seconds after.

"Every chance we had, it looked like it was going to go in," said GW goalkeeper Danielle Dourney, battling back the emotions of the moment. "It was very intense. There was so much heart out there for both teams, just fightin' and fightin' and fightin'."

Early on, GW was winning the fight. At 11:29, Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year Chenar Smith hit a beautiful ball from 18-yards out that curved outward toward the lower left post. The ball hydroplaned on the fast grass, whizzing past a diving Danielle Dion.

Throughout the rest of the first half, UMass struggled to get a shot on net, managing just two after the Smith goal. Meanwhile, GW had accumulated eight at that point, and Dourney was providing an inspiration to the Colonial Women, playing through a crunching unintentional collision with UMass' Melissa Mitchell at 17:00.

The Minutewomen adjusted at halftime, and came out flying after the break. At 46:26 off a Heidi Kocher corner kick, a wild scramble ensued in front of the net. A GW player then knocked the ball into her own net, tying the score at 1–1. Roberts' score came a little over eight minutes later, and UMass was all of a sudden clicking on all cylinders in the tension-filled contest.

"It feels like the team is coming together, so that gives you some confidence," said Mitchell. "We're playing a lot better than before."

"It just feels great. It's looking more and more like we can keep going on," said Kocher. "There's always ups and downs in a season, and we're just a strong group of women. We put it back together."

And as the rain-soaked team huddled around its Atlantic 10 championship trophy, it was hard to argue with that. They certainly had put it back together — in a big way

Senior Heidi Kocher and the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team defeated George Washington 2–1 in a thrilling Atlantic 10 title game at Garber field yesterday afternoon.

Factors play part in Atlantic 10 title game

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

It was a classic championship game with classic moments.

In yesterday's Atlantic 10 Conference Championship between the University of Massachusetts and George Washington at Richard F. Garber Field, there were many factors that played a huge part in the final outcome.

There was the play of GW's goalkeeper Danielle Dourney.

Early in the first half, with GW leading 1–0, Dourney and UMass forward Melissa Mitchell collided unintentionally and Dourney was down for a couple of minutes.

"When she first hit me, I thought she broke my leg," Dourney said.

Then, approximately eight minutes later, Dourney was knocked down again after Rachel LeDuc collided with her trying to get a shot off. "I was hurt the rest of the game but the majority of our team is playing with injuries, so I wasn't about to come out of the game," Dourney said.

> "It was a great atmosphere to see all the fans into it. It was my first game seeing it like this, They were loud and into it, which made us pick up the intensity and play more for ourselves."
> – Danielle Dion, UMass goalkeeper

Dourney was visibly affected by the collisions, limping at times, but she was able to stay in the game and still managed to make big saves. One came on a hard, high LeDuc shot with about 18 minutes left in the game that she somehow got a hand on to propel the ball over the net.

"She played great," UMass goalkeeper Danielle Dion said about her counterpart. "She had a phenomenal game, especially being a sub coming in after two of their keepers had already been injured on that team."

"That was courageous. She wasn't expected to be a big-timer," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "This kid did very well considering she took a heavy hit early on. She hung in here, she stayed in with it and that's hard to do."

There was the crowd.

After a quiet first half, the fans really got into it in the second. Singing "Ole, Ole... UMass, UMass...", the fans inspired the Minutewomen to victory.

"It absolutely helped us, the crowd did a lot for us" Rudy said. "They started into the 'Ole' and we started surging forward."

"It was a great atmosphere to see all the fans into it. It was my first game seeing it like this," Dion said. "They were loud and into it, which made us pick up the intensity and play more for ourselves."

"I've never seen a crowd like this before," Dourney said. "That was a big part of it."

There were the stories of overcoming the odds.

Julie Magid broke her nose against Cornell last week but it did not effect her play yesterday. She performed outstanding with her nose left unprotected.

"She outplayed a midfielder two, three inches taller than her and won headers," Rudy said. "Every time you win headers, it's a psychological advantage for the team."

There was the headwind.

UMass had been struggling entering the Vermont game on Oct. 26. But strangely, the team has not lost since defender Erin Lynch started wearing a white headband.

In the first half of yesterday's game that headband was no where to be found and UMass was down 1–0. "I totally forgot to put it on in the first half and no one reminded me," said Lynch, the A-10 Player of the Year.

But Assistant Coach April Kater spotted the missing headband and made Lynch aware of the situation. Needless to say, UMass went on to win the game 2–1.

Then, there was the weather.

The rain started falling about an hour before game time and did not really let up throughout the entire game, causing the field to be slick.

"It made the balls a lot harder to deal with coming into me," Dion said. "It made me think twice and concentrate more on what I was doing and not pick my head up so quick to see what was going on in front of me."

What was going on in front of her was a classic game filled with classic momenta.

Men's water polo going back to NCAAs

■ Win at Easterns qualifies water polo team for tourney

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

Who said history can only be made once?

The University of Massachusetts men's water polo team proved that it can happen again. By sweeping the competition this weekend, they will advanced to the NCAAs later this month by winning the Eastern championships at Brown University in Providence, R.I.

This is the second consecutive Eastern Championship and NCAA berth for the Minutemen. The team conceded first going into the single elimination rounds.

UMass crushed eighth seed Villanova University in the first round by the score of 17–10. Junior Luis Limardo led the team in scoring with eight goals, while senior co-captain Javier Gonzalez had four. However, the team was a little overconfident and lacking in defense, giving up a few quick goals to the opposition.

"I really wasn't impressed with our intensity," Coach Russ Yarworth said. "They just wanted to get through the first round. So, it's a good thing we got through it."

"We had a lack of concentration," senior co-captain Adolfo Oliete said. "But it's good to warm up. We need to get more ready for the next round."

The second round proved to be more difficult. Fifth seed Brown wasn't going to give up their chance at a berth too easily.

But it was Limardo again, leading the scoring with six goals, while Gonzalez and freshman Marc Staudenbaur each netted one a piece.

The UMass defense was also strong, with junior goalie Alex Mujica providing a brick wall in front of the net.

"I was really pleased with our defensive intensity," Yarworth said. "We had, maybe, two breakdowns that gave them goals, but after that, we were where we were supposed to be the whole time."

Brown put up a good fight, but it wasn't good enough.

UMass prevailed in the end, with a final score of 8–4.

"I knew Brown would be ready," Yarworth said. "They played a great game. It was in their home pool, and they knew it was going to be a brawl for it all."

The UMass fens were loud and strong, providing the team with the push they needed to raise their intensity to a higher level. The battle cry, "We want Navy!" was heard all the way back in Amherst.

The fans got their wish.

The Minutemen met second seed Navy in the final round on Sunday.

The first two quarters looked bleak for the Minutemen. They were almost overwhelmed by the aggressive counterattacks of Navy, which scored six goals to UMass' four.

But UMass wasn't ready to throw in the towel yet. Yarworth took them to the other side of the pool for a half–time pep talk.

"Coach laid it into us at the half, and told us it was our game to win," sophomore Greg Menton said. "He said, You're going to do it with hard nosed defense, and we did it."

The second half saw five straight goals for the Minutemen, giving Navy little opportunity to respond.

"Once they understood what I wanted, they did the right game plan on defense and shut them down," Yarworth said. "It's a sign of a great team when they can refocus and do that."

Once again, Mujica was the key to a solid defense, not letting in any goals in the second half.

"The whole team backed me up," Mujica said. "I was feeling that it was one of the best days of my life. i just saw every ball and felt like I could reach every one of them."

Mujica was only one of the heroes of this game. Junior John Luviano provided an important anchor for the offense, setting up several goals while denying his opponents any break–away opportunities.

"It gets to the point in this part of the season where the teams that are playing are so comparable," Menton said. "It's just whoever has the most desire, and the most intensity."

In the end, it was UMass who had the most. They defeated Navy with a final score of 9–6.

"The freshest in town."
"Ambiance galore."
"The waiters are always friendly."
"Best I've ever had."

Her white shorts had turned a muddy brown, and her legs were also spattered with souvenirs from the slick, messy playing surface at Richard F. Garber Field.

The white jersey clung to her body, and her hair straggled down past her shoulders, a victim of the heavy rain that pelted down earlier in the afternoon. As the skies continued to darken above, UMass forward Nicole Roberts' smile outshone the day itself.

"You could feel it, it was powerful today," said Roberts of the women's soccer team's 2–1 win over George Washington in the Championship match of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. UMass next hosts Harvard Wednesday in NCAA play.

It was Roberts who scored what turned out to be the game-winning goal at 54:50, on a bang–bang play that developed off a corner kick. The tally was Roberts' sixth game–winning goal on the season as, once again, the junior speedster delivered in the pressure–cooking situation.

"She's playing so maturely right now. I'm very impressed," Coach Jim Rudy said. "Her play puts her head and shoulders above almost every defender she's played against. She came here [as a freshman] and wanted everything to be perfect, but things take time. And the best things take the most time, and she's doing those things so well right now."

Roberts' goal was set up off a corner kick by sophomore midfielder Julie Magid. Magid, playing with an unprotected broken nose, served a line drive ball from the left corner to the front of the goal which was gathered in by sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers.

Myers, whose spectacular play over the weekend led to being named Outstanding Player of the tournament, then touched a pass through the air to an open Roberts, setting up the score.

But GW [12–8] was determined not to let Roberts' goal stand as the game winner. After a few good chances midway through the second half, the Colonial Women had a sparkling opportunity with just 30 seconds to play.

After a scramble in front of the UMass [15–5] net in which no player could gain possession of the ball, junior Maggie Miller hit the crossbar as the clanging sound vibrated

Minutewomen victim of upset, bow to Temple in A–10 tour-

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The Temple Owls ruined the University of Massachusetts hopes of winning their third straight Atlantic 10 field hockey by upsetting the Minutewomen 1–0 at St. Joseph's yesterday.

More harmful than the loss to the Minutewomen was the season–ending injury to goaltender Hilary Rose. With 7:24 remaining in the game, Rose took a forearm in the head by Temple forward Tara Silvestre. The blow caused Rose to fall backward, causing her to land on the back of her neck.

Rose was rushed to an area hospital, where she was treated and released. She has not sustained any neurological damage at this time. Backup goalie Stacy Walker finished the game and will start any remaining games for UMass.

The play shook players and coaches alike.

"As people who are close to her, it scared us," senior midfielder Colleen Duffy said. "It was horrible sportsmanship."

"You hope that never happens," said Temple Coach Lauren Fuchs, who was named the 1994 Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year. "I personally, and the rest of my team hopes that she is fine."

Temple came out strong in the first half, dictating the play early. With just over 10 minutes remaining, Temple earned their first penalty corner of the game and they made it count. After Rose made the initial save, Katrina Wolfe, who had just entered the game, gathered the rebound and drove it into the net for what proved to be the game's lone score.

UMass dominated most of the second half, but had trouble getting quality scoring opportunities on Temple goalie Deb Brown. With time winding down Donnelly moved sweeper Natalie Hart up to forward trying to tie the game, but they could not convert as the

Men's soccer loses to Rutgers in A–10 championship game

By Brian Gormley
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team's late rally against Rutgers University fell short, as the Scarlet Knights beat the Minutemen in the Atlantic 10 championship game yesterday, 4–3.

Massachusetts, the number one seed in the tournament, earned the right to play in the championship game by defeating West Virginia is the semi–final game on Friday afternoon, 5–1.

Massachusetts' record dropped to 13–6–1, while Rutgers improved their record to 10–9–3. Rutgers will now face Loyola, winner of the Metro–Atlantic conference, to see which team will advance to the NCAA tournament.

Rutgers dominated the opening 45 minutes, quickly building a 3–0 lead. Richie Ferraro opened the scoring just 52 seconds into the game off of a pass from Alan Branigan. Ferraro then contributed to the second Rutgers goal by assisting on a score by Ian Checio at 13:41.

Rutgers' Rob Johnson then made the score 3–0 with an unassisted goal at 35:10. The Minutemen got on the board at 36:29 when freshman forward Mike Butler scored goal off of an assist by midfielder Karsten Bremke, the A–10 Rookie of the Year. The goal came when Bremke looped the ball over Rutgers goalkeeper Steve Widdowson's head. Butler then collected the pass and booted it into the back of the net.

Butler brought the Minutemen within two early in the second half by connecting from 12 yard out off of an indirect kick by midfielder Joel Pittman at 58:33.

What proved to be the game–winning goal was scored unassisted by Rutgers' Brent Longenaker at 79:54, making the score 4–2.

Midfielder Colin Johnson brought the Minutemen back agair with their third goal off of a rebounded shot by Bremke at 89:22, but that is where the rally ended. Rutgers controlled the play for most of the game, getting 15 shots on net to Massachusetts' seven. Widdowson collected five saves for the Scarlet Knights, while Massachusetts' goalkeeper Mark Wolf had two saves.

Friday's semifinal game against West Virginia was a much different story. Even though the two teams battled Rene Ingoglia [19] rambles through the Northeastern defense. The junior RB had another big day, running for 166 yards in the Minutemen's 27–24 win at McGuirk Stadium.

Minutemen win on Ingoglia's TD

For one team, a disappointing season could have turned disastrous. For the other team, a nightmare of a season almost had a silver lining.

The University of Massachusetts football team needed a late Rene Ingoglia touchdown to defeat winless Northeastern 27–24 in front of 6,511 fans on Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Northeastern	24
Massachusetts	27

"This was such a relief. I'm most pleased with the mental aspects of the game," Coach Mike Hodges said. "These are the kind of games we've lost."

UMass [5–4, 4–3 in the Yankee Conference] once again was lead by its rushing attack, as both Ingoglia [29 carries, 166 yards] and Frank Alessio [23–104] combined to carry the offense.

Northeastern [0–9, 0–6] came close to its first win of the season. Down 20–6 at halftime, Freshman quarterback Jim Murphy lead a spirited second–half comeback that saw the Huskies score 18 unanswered points.

"These losses are the toughest to take, to be that close and have it taken away is just a killer," Murphy said.

The Minutemen needed a late drive to set up Ingoglia's winning touchdown on fourth down with only 28 seconds left. UMass ran the football on all 13 plays of the winning drive, which spanned 47 yards, eating up 5:23 in the fourth quarter.

"They may be desperate for a win, but we were the desperate team on that last drive," Hodges said.

After Ingoglia gave the Minutemen a three–point lead, the ensuing kickoff was kicked onside, caught and downed by Northeastern at the 50. That gave the Huskies the ball with 28 seconds left in the game. The point became moot as Murphy's first down pass was overthrown and intercepted by Tony Williams.

"The kickoff was designed to be a 20 or 30 yard squib kick, but [kicker Eric Oke] miss–hit it. We didn't want to kick it long to give them a possible big return," Hodges said.

The Minutemen dominated the first half on both sides of the ball, picking up 274 total yards on offense, compared to 74 for Northeastern. UMass scored on its opening possession as Ingoglia took a pitch from QB Andrew McNeilly and broke free for a 25–yard touchdown.

On its next possession, UMass utilized the running of Ingoglia and Alessio to set up an Oke 47–yard field–goal, making it 10–0. The kick was Oke's longest of the season.

Northeastern cut into the lead on an Ike Wilkins two–yard touchdown run with the extra–point failing. An Oke 43–yard field goal made it 13–6 for the Minutemen, who then held the Huskies and regained possession on its own 29. The Minutemen then reached into their bag of tricks to surprise the Huskies.

Clark Ramos, a converted quarterback, checked into the game at tailback. McNeilly pitched back to Ramos, who rolled right and threw the halfback option pass to a wide–open Kevin Bourgoin for a 71–yard touchdown. Bourgoin was 10 yards ahead of the stunned defense, accounting for the longest pass–play of the year for UMass.

"We've had that play in our gameplan for a while. We just saw an opportunity to use it today and took advantage of it," Hodges said.

Minutemen lose two at home

After suffering three straight road losses, the University of Massachusetts hockey team hoped two home games at the Mullins Center would turn things around. Colgate and Union had different ideas.

UMass [0–5] was defeated on Friday by Colgate 5–1 and Union 6–3 on Saturday. The inexperience of the Minutemen showed at times, as evidenced by the many defensive lapses, UMass could not build upon the momentum generated by two narrow Hockey East losses last weekend.

Union	6

"The effort wasn't there compared to last weekend," coach Joe Mallen said. "As experience comes, we will play better."

Colgate came out flying on Friday night, scoring three goals before seven minutes had expired in the first period. Matt Garzone put the Red Raiders on the board at 1:01 of the first period with his first goal of the season.

The Red Raiders struck again at 5:28, just as UMass' Dennis Wright was leaving the penalty box after serving a tripping penalty. Tim Loftsgard banged in a Chris DeProfio rebounded from just left of the crease.

Steve DuBarry continued the quick start by scoring at

Volleyball split two A–10 matches this weekend

Minutewomen defeat WVa on Friday, fall to GW on Saturday

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team split two conference matchups at home this past weekend. The Minutewomen defeated the West Virginia Mountaineers 15–10, 15–11, 15–5 on Friday night before falling to the Colonial Women of George Washington 9–15, 9–15, 8–15 on Saturday. Both matches took place in the Curry Hicks Cage.

The Minutewomen, now 22–4 overall [8–4 In Atlantic 10 play], continue to battle for third place in the conference, and the third seed in the A–10 tournament.

"I think we'll be all right (in the conference standings)," said Coach Bonnie Kenny. "If it comes down to a tie between us and Temple, we win on points."

On Saturday night, UMass hosted the Colonial Women, who are No. 10 in the Mideast Region, and came into the match in sole possession of first place in the A–10 after defeating the University of Rhode Island on Friday.

GW, who raised their record to 27–3, and 11–1 In the conference, had only lost one time all year to an A–10 foe, and that was to the Minutewomen three weeks ago in Washington D.C. UMass became the first league team to defeat the Colonial Women since 1992, and broke GW's five–match winning streak against UMass.

Saturday was a different story entirely, however, as George Washington was able to keep UMass on their heels all night, en route to the three–game victory.

"(GW senior outside hitter) Liu Li, didn't play in the game at George Washington," said Kenny. "She is the conference's leader in hitting efficiency, and that just opened up their offense even more."

"I think we'll be all right (in the conference standings). If it comes down to a tie between us and Temple, we win on points."
–Coach Bonnie Kenny

"Last time they didn't block us as well," said Massachusetts freshman outside hitter Lesley Nolan, who garnered eight kills, and led UMass with 11 digs. "Tonight, they knew us better, and played a lot smarter."

George Washington was led by junior outside hitter Svetlana Vtyurina. The 6–foot 4–inch native of Moscow, Russia collected 18 kills to add to her league leading total. Vtyurina, an imposing force, was last year's A–10 Player of the Year, and collected her 2,000th career kill in the match against Rhode Island. She is only the 20th player in NCAA Division I history to reach that mark.

"They are definitely a big team," said sophomore outside hitter Dionne Nash about the Colonial Women, who have seven players on their roster listed at 6–foot or taller. "We should have played smarter."

Outside hitter Giza Rivera led UMass with 15 kills, the 19th time she has led the squad in that category. The sophomore's 5.08 kills per game trail only Vtyurina in the conference.

"Giza mixed up her attacks well," Kenny said. "Lesley also hit the ball pretty well, especially in the first two games. We did some good things, but we are not used to playing against that kind of offense. Our inexperience in the middle really showed."

Nash also played well for the Minutewomen. She was second on the team in both kills [12] and digs [9], and tied Rivera for a team best .300 hitting percentage.

Setter Cass Anderson, playing in her final volleyball game in the Cage, was steady, racking up 45 assists.

"We played in spurts," said Nash. "They came in ready to play, and we gave them too many strings of points when we needed a sideout. Our blocking and defense was

Students rally for today's election: Go and vote

By Jessica Taverna and Tim White
Collegian Staff

Groups rallied on the University of Massachusetts Student Union Building steps yesterday to urge students to vote in today's election.

"No on Question 3" campaigners yelled into a microphone at noon to advocate students' rights, and later, UMass cheerleaders performed acrobatics to "pep up" by-standers.

Members of the "No on Question 3" campaign told students about the question and gave reasons they should not vote for it.

"Students' freedom is being taken away," said Julia Lev, the chair of the No on Question 3 campaign on campus.

Students can stand up for their rights and give themselves a voice by voting, according to Lev.

Question 3 deals with how student groups collect fees on tuition bills. Voting "no" on Question 3 would allow student groups, such as MASSPIRG, to continue to collect money on tuition bills through a waivable fee.

A recent Boston Globe poll showed that 43 percent said they will vote no, 27 percent said they will vote yes and 30 percent said they will remain undecided.

Students from 27 schools in Massachusetts have voted for 22 years to keep the waiver on the bill, Lev said.

Lobbyists, consisting of special interest groups and industry, put together the ballot question to strip MASSPIRG of its funding, Lev said.

MASSPIRG's active political movement has addressed industry-related issues, such as hazardous waste control, and in doing so, has made some powerful enemies on Beacon Hill, Lev said. MASSPIRG focuses on environmental issues and consumers's rights.

"They're saying we are too stupid to figure out that there is a waivable fee on our tuition bills," Lev said.

Question 3 will make MASSPIRG more accountable for their actions in the long run, according to James Resnick, a freshman senator in the Student Government Association.

"There are too many liberal clubs that are not as accountable to the student body as they should be," Resnick said. "This will lead to more efficiency and a better atmosphere because people will know what's going on."

If 3 passes, it will be "the beginning of big businesses taking away student lobbying abilities," said Jay Crossland, a junior senator in SGA.

Later in the afternoon, the UMass cheerleading squad toted signs and performed acrobatics on the Student Union steps to try to get students' attention so they could encourage them to vote.

According to Tracey Pimpare, co-captain of the squad, they were also there to rally support for themselves.

"We were supposed to go to the [National Cheerleading Association]," said Pimpare. "We fell $6,000 short of the goal."

Jay Crossland, a junior who has an internship at the Save Our Schools Coalition, said he made a deal with the cheerleaders to help them advertise their cause, and get people to vote at the same time.

"I made a deal knowing the cheerleaders need help," said Crossland. "It gives visibility for [the cheerleaders'] efforts, in return for $500 if they go to Nationals."

Brett Mance said they only raised $4,000 of the needed funds due Thursday, and it would be unlikely they would be going to Nationals this year.

"So what this does is publicize their efforts," Crossland said. "Their hope is the athletic department will notice and will budget them next year for the event."

Both groups, the cheerleaders and the No on 3 campaigners, consisted of approximately eight to ten individuals, and neither rally drew a substantial crowd.

Romney remains confident, says victory is 'within reach'

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

As the 1994 campaign winds down, Republican Mitt Romney is using virtually every mode of transportation except a hovercraft to pound home his reasons why voters should oust U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

On Saturday, it was a train trip from Boston to Haverhill, with plenty of stops in between. Sunday, he hopped on a bus from Hyannis to Brockton.

And yesterday, the 47-year-old Belmont resident took to the skies, crisscrossing Massachusetts in a helicopter in an 11th-hour pitch for votes before Tuesday's elections.

"People are going to go into the voting booth and they're going to say 'Who can do what really needs to be done?' And I'm seeing it in our polls, and I'm seeing it when I go out and talk to people. I think the momentum is very much coming our way," Romney said. The two candidates made separate appearances on a WRKO-AM talk show Monday morning.

Kennedy said Romney didn't understand a basic rule of legislating: "There's no simplistic answers."

"My opponent thinks there's a simple answer for every complex problem, and there's not," he said.

Romney accused Kennedy of "hiding from his record," saying the senator was more interested in announcing federal grants than discussing his policies.

"Isn't it amazing, John Kerry isn't bringing in any money this year. It'll be his turn in two years," he said.

"If we're going to elect our senators and congressman on the basis of pork, then our country becomes a feeding trough." After indicating that the race between the 32-year Democratic incumbent and the venture capitalist from Belmont was a dead beat, Kennedy appeared to pull away last week, with independent polls giving him a 15 point lead.

But Romney, who is airing a 30-minute advertisement throughout the weekend in an effort to sway undecided voters, said victory was well within reach.

"I have every confidence it's going to take us over the line Tuesday night," he said after a fervent hometown rally at Belmont High School, where he was cheered by more than 600 people. Tuesday will be Kennedy's seventh Election Day. The Democrat also planned to tour Massachusetts by helicopter today, hitting Fall River, Chicopee, Worcester, Tewksbury, Winthrop and Boston. Kennedy said previously undecided voters had turned to him in recent days after examining his 32-year record.

"There are many people's lives I've been able to help," he said at a Democratic rally Sunday. "I'm on their side. That's why I want to go back to the U.S. Senate."

The day before, he reinforced his claim that he wields mighty influence in Washington, announced a $330 million federal grant for a mass transit loop that will link Boston's South Station with its new federal courthouse and World Trade Center.

"We're going back (to the Senate) to continue for a bigger, a better, a busier Boston," a confident Kennedy told about 60 union masons.

Violence in Southwest is under investigation

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

There were two separate incidents of violence in Southwest Residential Area recently which are currently under investigation — an alleged rape, and a student who claimed he was beaten by multiple assailants.

University of Massachusetts Public Safety reported yesterday a rape allegedly happened Oct. 30 at 4 a.m. in a Southwest residence hall. The police received the report of the incident on Nov. 2.

There was only one alleged assailant, but the police can not comment on information concerning suspects while the case is still under investigation, according to Danny Chun, University spokesman.

In a separate incident, three individuals allegedly assaulted and beat up an individual outside of MacKimmie Residence Hall in Southwest on Saturday, according to the police log.

The alleged victim received stitches to the back of his head and suffered from a fractured cheek bone. Police are still interviewing witnesses in the incident, according to a press release.

Neither court officer Phil Cavanaugh nor Jack Luippold, the chief of police and director of public safety, were available for comment yesterday and no other police officials were available for comment.

Blood supply short; demand for type O needed for patients

The Northeast Region of the American Red Cross is under stress to fill a critical blood shortage because of an increased demand for blood by hospitals and blood shortages experienced nationally by other chapters of the American Red Cross.

All types of blood are needed, but the blood in highest demand is type O — the universal blood donor. While 74 percent of all donors have type O blood, most other blood type patients also require type O blood. Jodi Liquornik, a donor recruitment specialist for the American Red Cross, said type O blood is usually the first to be depleted.

"Our supply of O is the first to go and everything else follows suite," Liquornik said.

There will be a mobile collection staff at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union today through Thursday from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Anyone who is at least 17 years of age, 110 pounds, in relatively good health, and has no known contact with HIV virus is eligible to donate, Liquornik said.

People planning to donate may want to eat breakfast or lunch before hand, said Liquornik.

Everything used by the mobile collection staff is disposable. It is impossible to get an infection from donating blood, Liquornik said.

Government soldiers end hopes of peace in Angola

By Casimiro Siona
Associated Press

LUANDA, Angola (AP) — Days away from a treaty to end Africa's longest civil war, the Angolan government killed hopes for peace Monday when its soldiers overran rebel headquarters.

Government troops smashed through rebel defense lines around Huambo, killing 500 rebels and taking control of strategic points like the airport and military compound 330 miles southeast of Luanda, said Brig Jose Manuel, known in battle by his nickname "Jota."

The rebels denied being routed from the city but said peace negotiations were off.

"Unfortunately, Lusaka has ended," Adalberto da Costa Junior, Lisbon representative for the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), said of the peace talks held in Zambia's capital.

Just a week ago, Angolan government and rebel officials were sipping champagne together in Lusaka to celebrate a U.N.–brokered peace plan resulting from 11 months of heated negotiations. President Jose Eduardo dos Santos and UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi were scheduled to sign the treaty on Nov. 15.

The treaty was to end fighting that erupted on the eve of independence from Portugal in November 1975, when UNITA, anti-colonial guerrillas, went to war against a rival movement that seized power.

Over its 19 years of independence, Angola has enjoyed peace for only a few months.

The government has ignored appeals from the United Nations and President Clinton to respect the treaty, and instead pushed ahead with its assault on rebel-held territory.

Da Costa Junior said rebel commanders in Huambo had reported government troops were still at least six miles outside the city. But Manuel told reporters in Luanda, "The UNITA leadership has fled Huambo. Government troops are now in the center of the city and advancing."

The rebels' top military commander — Arlindo Pena, called by his guerrilla name "Ben-Ben" — had abandoned the rebel base in what was once Angola's second-largest city, Manuel said.

Rebel fighters were battling government troops in the streets as they retreated, while desperate civilians were trying to escape into the bushland, Manuel said. The bush is littered with landmines.

While denying that the government had captured Huambo, Da Costa Junior said the attack showed the peace talks were "just a decoy to buy time."

Support group offers help to women

Dietician explains eating disorders are societal, psychological

By Colleen Shanahan
Collegian Correspondent

Are you thinking about how much you weigh right now? Are you thinking about binging? How about purging?

According to Paula L. Olson, MSW, LICSW at Circa Psychotherapy Associates for Women in Northampton, 25 percent of the women on the University of Massachusetts campus have an eating disorder.

Robin Levine, a Registered Dietician at University Health Services (UHS), said 450 women come in each academic year for treatment of an eating disorder.

Olson runs an eating disorders support group designed to help women understand and alleviate their preoccupations with food.

Whether the disorder is anorexia, bulimia or even compulsive exercising, the fact remains that one quarter of the women here are obsessed with the notion that they must be thin to be attractive.

What made these women become so grossly dissatisfied with their appearances?

Olson said she felt eating disorders are "a normative concern in our culture that sometimes gets out of hand for some people."

Olson maintained that the root of the eating disorder is both societal and psychological. It is painfully obvious that movies, magazines, billboards and basically all forms of advertising guide women in what they think they should look like to gain social acceptance, according to Olson.

Levine supports Olson's theory. "There is a myth surrounding food and weight control that the popular media and advertisers perpetuate. They are not there in the interest of the viewer," Levine said.

In trying so hard to look "good," the affected women turn to such self-defeating behaviors as starving or binging and purging to achieve the now popular, waifish Kate Moss look, according to Olson.

Olson also explained that psychologically, many women use their weight as a symbol of power. Women who were raised in domineering, controlling environments feel they have never had control over anything concerning them, except their weight.

Other women have such low self esteem that they see themselves as fat and ugly, even though others may view those same women as beautiful, said Olson.

Women who suffer from eating disorders are plagued with a critical, distorted view of themselves. Olson said these women feel depressed and ashamed when they eat, and depressed and ashamed when they purge, they fight a no- win battle everyday. As Olson put it, the smoker can live without cigarettes, the alcoholic can live without alcohol, the bulimic cannot live without food.

Another theory Olson has studied is the socialization of our culture. She has discovered that women are taught to care for others, nurture and soothe. In doing so they lose track of their own needs, forget to nurture themselves, and deny their own feelings. Food becomes their solution.

Giving to oneself, according to Olson, is self medicating, yet still part of a vicious cycle. This cycle is supported by feelings of guilt.

At Circa Psychotherapy Associates for Women there is client-based psychotherapy, individual or in group sessions to help those faced with eating disorders.

Olson counsels women on how to build self esteem and design new coping strategies other than food. The program centers on developing new behaviors by determining where the destructive habits originally stemmed from, and working to change them into healthier relationships.

At UHS, Levine helps women become healthy by assessing their risk, overall health and weight. Together, doctor and patient set a goal and make a plan of what should be worked on first, making sure the patient is receiving enough vitamins, iron, protein and other nutrients.

Like Olson, Levine also tries to achieve an understanding of eating behaviors to assess the problem. The woman will also be referred to a therapist at Hills North for counseling. Levine is working with women who have come to her in all different stages of their eating disorder. "These women are in stages of recovery and want to make changes," Levine said. For more information about group or individual therapy, contact Paula L. Olson at 586-6471 or Robin Levine at 549- 2671.

The other day I met with some friends from high school for dinner. They were bragging about this and that. Going on and on and on. "Oh, yes. Buffy and I are buying a little berry villa near Mackinellan Concrete Rock Park." So much so that we have little time to devote to directing our own lives. Suddenly I was overcome with an extremely excited urge to go skydiving right then. I went up with a complacent smile, landing down on an insane little surprise. Without bragging, I know in my heart I was light years ahead of those rookie. I write for THE DAILY COLLEGIAN. Complete and utter enjoyment.

Springfield-Union offers apology

Newspaper admits mistake in reporter's actions in classroom

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

The Springfield Union-News formally apologized to student athletes at the University of Massachusetts on Saturday for the actions of one of their reporters.

The Union-News published an apology over the weekend admitting the error by reporter Brad Smith when he distributed a copy of the confidential academic records of UMass athletes in a journalism class. Smith's actions were in violation of the University Family Rights and Privacy Act.

Smith was invited by part-time UMass instructor Steve Simurda to talk to students in a media criticism class about a recent Union-News story regarding UMass men's basketball players on academic probation.

Smith passed out a copy of the material he received from an anonymous source containing transcripts of the UMass basketball players as well as the grade point averages of Black student athletes.

"This was inappropriate, not condoned by the newspaper and I offer our apologies to the student athletes involved," said Union-News Executive Editor Larry McDermott in the written apology which appeared in the "Hampshire" section of the newspaper.

Chancellor David K. Scott issued a statement regarding the comments made by the Union-News officials, but did not say whether action would be taken against Smith or Simurda.

The UMass Black Student Union is demanding Smith, and the source of the players' transcripts originally printed in the Union-News and the Boston Globe, be prosecuted.

"We appreciate the Union-News acknowledging that a grievous error in judgement and an affront to our students occurred when Brad Smith distributed confidential student information to a journalism class," Scott said in a statement.

Black Homecoming weekend a 'spiritual success,' community participation high

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

The revitalized Black Homecoming Weekend was a welcome treat to all involved, drawing in hundreds of participants.

Many students took part in each of the three days' events, which began on Friday with a showing of Superfly at New Africa House and culminated with the ALANA (Asian, Latin American, and Native American) Christian Alliance Gospel Concert.

Saturday was the fullest day of activities, leading off with the Black Homecoming Parade.

"I was really pleased with the turnout especially since many people had been out until after 3:00 the night before," UMass sophomore and BMCP (Black Mass Communications Project) business manager Gamal Walker said, referring to the BMCP-sponsored party the previous evening.

Most of the marchers went on to the ALANA Organizational Fair in the Campus Center Auditorium, where festive music and hors d'oeuvres awaited, in addition to a collection of RSOs, vendors, and Greek system representatives.

"I felt as though there was a real sense of unity," said Teri Wilson, a junior, of the parade and fair. "It was one of the few times we've been brought together without controversy. It was really needed."

Clearly though, the Black Student Union Semi-Formal was the highlight of the weekend in many students' opinions. Not only were the food and dress considered impeccable, but also the entertainment, performers of multicultural song and dance.

"It was nice because there was a different atmosphere than the parties at the Malcolm X Cultural Center," Wilson said.

Walker said he observed no fighting or substance use, factors which he believes contributed to the class and charm of the night's main event.

The final event, Sunday's gospel concert, also drew a large audience.

Sophomore Stanley Boykin said "everybody was happy and just got into the music," — an image that would seem to fit the general tone of this year's homecoming.

Co-planners Mary Custard and Shannan Magee had similar sentiments.

"I'm pleased because the students worked especially hard to pull it all together," Custard said. "It was important considering the turmoil of the past few weeks."

Magee's take on the weekend was more personal.

"Some people call me an idealist," Magee said. "If being an idealist means following a dream and seeing it through, then I guess I am one. This weekend was a spiritual success."

Billboard tries to solve controversy

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A community billboard will be started on the second floor of Thatcher Residence Hall in response to graffiti on a resident assistant's door.

A meeting was held a week ago to discuss the incident between Resident Assistant Abdul Kanaan and a resident on his floor, Andrej Mucic, to find a solution to the situation.

The meeting was held between two students and Paul Vasconcellos, assistant dean of students. Agreements were reached based on the fact that the two live on the same floor and in the same community. Further information on arrangements is confidential, Vasconcellos said.

No disciplinary action was taken against Mucic who wrote that Kanaan was a "holocaust expert" on a message board on Kanaan's door, Mucic said.

"They said I could express myself anyway I chose, and had the right to attack and criticize his religion anyway I wanted to," Mucic said. "That's not what I meant to do, but even if I did, I have that right."

Mucic said he thought the message board was a place for residents on the floor to express their ideas and freely express themselves because others had written on it, he said.

The resolution that was reached, which will provide for a free-thought message board, has made the victim look like the offender, according to Kanaan.

"According to the assistant dean's definition of harassment, it's [harassment] not just acceptable, but encouraged," Kanaan said. "To express your feelings, it's O.K.; to say every Black person is a nigger, every Jew a blood-sucker, every gay a'faggot and every white person a devil."

Kanaan will be responsible for the community quote board, where students on the floor can all freely express themselves, their ideas, opinions and stick up clips on current or upcoming events, according to Desiree Lalbeharie-Josias, the resident director for the Thatcher cluster.

"Freedom of expression is a touchy issue," according to Lalbeharie-Josias.

"This is a diverse community, consisting of people with different ideas and beliefs. This board will be place for them to express themselves, not openly debate their differences," Lalbeharie-Josias said.

Women fare poorly in coeducation

By Erin Barnes
Collegian Staff

Gender is more than just an attribute of individuals. It is a set of social processes by which women and men, because they are treated differently, come to see themselves as different and behave accordingly.

In gendered interactions, belief in these differences becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy — one that disadvantages women.

These concepts, among others, were discussed at a three- day seminar on "Studies in Success: Applying Effective Models to Educating Women and Girls" at Mount Holyoke College this past weekend.

The session "Self-Evaluation in the Presence of Another: Does Gender Make a Difference?" noted that gender processes in interaction may contribute to the reason why girls and women show lower levels of self-confidence and self-esteem in academic settings. Presenter Linda L. Carli, an assistant professor of psychology at Wellesley College, said self-evaluation, as well as achievement, is higher among women attending single-sex institutions than those attending colleges with men.

Carli discussed two reasons why women's self-confidence is undermined in coeducation. First, academic institutions tend to encourage and favor men. Second, gender becomes more salient when men and women are together, thus, each show more "gender awareness."

"We tend to associate confidence and achievement with masculinity," Carli said. "Together, women and men force each other to look at one another in those terms."

Carli gathered her conclusions about gender after conducting a controlled study which analyzed the behavior of men and women when forced to discuss gender-neutral topics.

Carli said men exhibited negative social behavior towards women, even though both men and women showed similarities in the quantity and quality of their ideas. Men evaluated themselves more favorably in the mere presence of women, where, conversely, women evaluated themselves more negatively in presence of men, according to Carli.

Carli also said gender acts as a status cue in mixed-sex settings. She said the only solution to this problem is to create a culture where status is not gender-based.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

Cast your ballot today

Today is election day and a time to voice your opinion. As students, voting is a chance to let the adult community — all the ones that don't take us seriously, know we are serious about the future of our communities and our school.

Voting is important not only to have a say in who takes office, but also to have leverage with those who are elected. The legislature need students to vote before they will give any weight or consideration to our demands for lower tuition and improve the quality of statewide education.

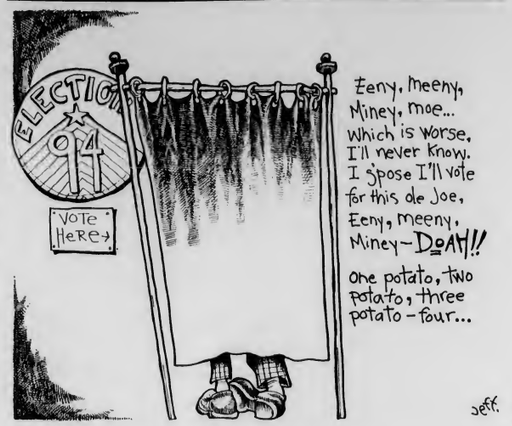
Our time to make a difference is now. If we wait for another election to gain votes to give us power to lobby the legislature, we will be dumping our responsibilities on future classes of the University.

Students need to have the courage and the respect for our civil duty to vote and make the future of the University brighter. Without a strong showing of student voters, students will not be taken seriously on Beacon Hill.

The Save Our Schools Coalition, along with other campus services, will be providing rides all day long to the polls. The ride is free and students will be brought home after voting.

Volunteers are waiting to chauffeur and hope to be bring the 2,000 registered voters to the polls. It may be difficult to get yourself to the polling stations, but that is no excuse for not voting. Take advantage of the ride and cast your vote.

Opinion/Editorial



Jeff Wilson

'Green' party could change politics

As Republican leaders have been predicting, today's elections will completely change the face of American politics.

The GOP will win at least five Senate seats, and pick up at least 35 in the House. While the Senate will remain Democratic, by a vote or two, the House may switch hands for the first time in 40 years. Republicans will win or hold most governorships in the Northeast, with wins for Bill Weld in Massachusetts and John Rowland in Connecticut. Mario Cuomo will hold New York for the Democrats by a handful of votes.

Peter J. Orvetti

The bad news: Convicted felon and Bible-thumper Oliver North will become a member of the Senate that once tried him. He will become the most corrupt member of that body since the Gilded Age. — Nixon included. Newt Gingrich very well may become Speaker of the House, two heartbeats away from the presidency.

There is little good news, at least for the Democrats. Ted Kennedy will survive the challenge of rich kid Mitt Romney.

In California, Dianne Feinstein will defeat Michael Huffington by a narrow margin.

The real shake-up of the day, though, will be in the voters' condemnation of both parties. Rejecting the Perot politics they embraced two years ago by defeating self-styled politicos like Angus King in Maine, the electorate will send a message. Independents are not enough. They must be progressives.

Progressive politics was declared dead in 1980. In 1992, the Democratic party redefined itself as a centrist party, nominating its most mainstream national ticket since Truman's day. Now, the progressive agenda is in a vacuum, and dissatisfied voters are looking for someone to fill it.

Having grown tired of the smoke-and-mirrors arguments for "free trade" and "laissez-faire" that serve only to further polarize wealth, today's returns will show voters seeking not liberalism, but populism.

While Republicans may win today's races, the numbers will show a considerable progressive-populist tendency.

In Maine, running with no money against three well-funded opponents, Green Party candidate Jonathan Carter may win 10 percent of the vote.

In New Jersey, independent congressional candidate Greg Pason, challenging an entrenched ally of the Administration, has received the endorsement of the National Association for Women and will poll considerable numbers.

Most startling of all, in New Mexico, Green Roberto Mondragon may be elected governor. He is locked in a tight three-way race against a millionaire contractor and the incumbent Bruce King, a Democratic boss who has ruled state politics since 1970.

With a common-sense message of progressive politics, Mondragon has attracted everyone from long-haired bikers to police and Marines to his campaign. Six months ago, the New Mexico Greens couldn't even find five candidates for statewide office.

The progressive ground which the Democrats abandoned, first by adopting an elitist liberalism and then moving to the right with Clinton, is gaining popularity. Today, as the Democrats have their worst election day since 1980, they may regret their shift.

1996 will see several new political movements. The Perot forces will be back for one more try. The radical right of the twin Pats, Robertson and Buchanan, may make a third-party effort. But most likely is a new progressive coalition.

A grassroots party has been talked about ever since the 1992 election. Longtime liberals like Gov. Lowell Weicker of Connecticut may team up with progressive activists like Jesse Jackson.

With the support of the Greens, the New Party (which, founded two years ago, is one of the fastest-growing political parties in the country) and other groups on the democratic left, and with the help of the progressives who brought into the charade of the Jerry Brown crusade in '92, this new coalition could be a success.

There would be no victory in 1996, just as there will be few wins today. But, as today's results will lead to greater successes, so will the successes of the future.

Violence isn't confined to city

"You did what?" I asked my friend in amazement over what he had just told me.

"I shot the kid," he answered calmly, with a smirk.

"Why'd ya shoot him?"

"He was talkin' trash, so I popped him."

In my sophomore year of high school, listening to people talk about shootings left me in complete disbelief. I was a small farm town kid who moved to a city which can't stop the growing problem of violence. After four years in Springfield, when I heard people got shot I was just happy if they weren't friends of mine.

I've met a lot of people who have seen people get killed, friends who were shot and stabbed. These incidents happened in Los Angeles. East St. Louis and New York City, though, not Springfield and Holyoke.

Justin Doyle

My friends laugh at me here at UMass, they call me a gangster wanna-be when they here my stories. It just doesn't seem funny to me. I consider myself lucky. I was able to stay away from the guns and the drugs.

When I first came to UMass, it took a while for the fear to subside. I realized that you could walk around campus at midnight and not worry about getting jumped. I still looked around when walking around late at night, but I felt safe.

Talking to my parents, during the week, they would fill me in on who was shot and where. In a matter of two weeks, there was a shooting at the X in Springfield, two drive-by shootings in Holyoke (three were killed), and a prison riot broke-out 15 minutes from my house.

The summers are the worst, because the gang wars seemed to heat up with the weather. The Latin Kings, a national gang who moved into the Springfield area several years ago, had gunfights last summer with the police on consecutive weeks. The Kings sparked up confrontations with rival gangs including Los Solidos and La Familia.

Now, it has followed me like a rain cloud above my head. Rumors that gang initiation was going to happen on Halloween like some kind of Devil's Night, spread across Western Massachusetts. Reports said that initiation would involve drive-by shootings on selected targets, including white females. I tried to ignore what I was hearing, but it eventually got to me.

That Monday, information flooded around campus that students from local schools were being advised to stay home and not to go out on Halloween night. I talked to other friends who told me that many kids in junior high and high schools were taken home by parents or stayed home. Students at the Kiley School were not allowed outside during the day until the bus arrived to take them home. Students were even escorted to the bathrooms.

I could not believe what I was hearing. Even the six o'clock news had reports of added security during the school day at Putnam and Commerce high, both schools where members of gangs allegedly attended.

Although I stopped hanging around Springfield over a year ago, I still have friends in the area. Anyone who knows what I am talking about will understand when I say that I was worried and a little scared. Not for myself, but for family and friends.

I sat around all night, waiting to see if anyone would be shot. It sounds like a joke, because the rumors of what might happen stopped thousands of students in Western Mass. from going to school. They were rumors, and no one was reportedly killed, but if the percautions taken saved at least one life it was well worth it. Unfortunately, for many kids, the costumes weren't the scariest thing about Halloween.

You tend to forget about gangs and guns in farm country. Sure, there is the occasional bar fight outside Antonio's or at the Pub, but city problems don't seem to affect them. I'm not talking about an occasional stabbing, but the most common thing killed in Amherst is cows. Students are lulled into thinking that these things like drive-by shootings just don't happen in Western Massachusetts, but it's just not true. Gangs haven't just limited themselves to Springfield.

Last year police officers broke into a dorm room in Southwest with a warrant for the arrest of a UMass student believed to be one of the gang leaders for the Latin Kings in the area. The student was arrested for ordering the attempted murder of a kid, allegedly started as a dispute over the color of the beads he wore. The student was sentenced to life in prison.

I don't know how much closer you can get.

Question 3 is a student issue

To the editor:

Question 3 is a referendum question on the ballot this Tuesday that will prohibit students from using waivable fees to support groups on campus that "try to influence our elected officials." It is taking away the student's right to decide what we do and do not want to support.

There is no doubt in anyone's mind that this law is directed at MASSPIRG. The Massachusetts Student Public Interest and Research Group has been empowering students across the state for decades.

In fact, the original MASSPIRG chapter was founded right here at UMass in 1972 when a group of students voted to assess themselves a four dollar waivable fee to hire a staff and enable themselves to work on environmental, consumer and good government issues.

Not only does MASSPIRG work in the legislature to pass laws supporting these issues, but students also actively participate in the community. They teach environmental education in primary schools, volunteer in homeless shelters and staff consumer information hotlines.

In the past 22 years, students from 26 other colleges in Massachusetts have voted for the waivable fee, to fund their own MASSPIRG chapters.

Every three to four years students at each of these campuses vote to decide if they will continue to support their campus chapter of MASSPIRG through the waivable fee.

This fee is itemized at the bottom of each student's tuition bill. It is explained in detail that this four dollars, that the student body voted on, is waivable. This means that if an individual student decides that he or she does not want to support MASSPIRG, they simply don't pay it.

What the editorial staff of the Collegian has failed to understand is that the funding mechanism of MASSPIRG is NOT what will be voted on today. Students will vote on if and how they want to fund MASSPIRG in the next two years. The question is: Will the Massachusetts Legislature allow us to hold that vote?

This is not just a MASSPIRG issue. It affects us all. If the government can take away our right to choose, to vote, to support whatever type of organization we decide to support, what will they do next? We must, as a student body, vote No on Question 3. We must maintain our voting power.

The famous consumer advocate Ralph Nader said it best: "Question 3 is the most anti-consumer, anti-environmental and anti-democracy law passed by the Massachusetts Legislature in years. It reeks of special interest politics at its worst." Don't let special interests buy out Massachusetts again. More importantly, don't let them buy you out. Vote No on Question 3. Keep student rights alive.

Get out to the polls

To the editor:

Ever since 18-year-olds received the privilege (and responsibilities) of voting, some collegiates have thought it "intellectual," or "cool," or both NOT to vote — and to rationalize this cop-out with the cheap sneer of the cynic: "What's the difference? They're all rotten."

Recently, alas, those who still have the brains, and character, to know that their votes do matter — and that staying away in itself affects the outcome — have chosen a second cop-out: "It's time for a change" — a.k.a "T'row da bums out." Any bums. Whoever's in. The devil I don't know must be better than the devil I do know.

No difference? Change for the sake of protest-only? Or because Mitt Romney is indeed "The Change We Need!"

Well, let's see. If Romney should actually become the 51st Republican senator, these are a few of the men [sic] who will take over the powerful chairmanships of key Senate Committees:

Under Majority Leader Bob Dole (aged 71; 26 years' Senatorial service), Jesse Helms (73; 22 years' service) will oversee our Foreign Relations; Orrin Hatch (60; 18 years'), the Judiciary, which controls the appointments of all Federal judges; and Strom Thurmond (91; 40), our Armed services.

Senators Dole, Helms and Hatch have all been given 100 percent ratings by the Rev. Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition (the alliance attacked by opponents — including the "mainstream" Christians — as "the Radical 'Religious' Right").

Sens. Helms, Hatch and Thurmond have received 0 percent ratings from NARAL (the watchdog of the "Pro- Choice" forces — including the Religious Coalition for Reproductive Choice). Furthermore, environmentalists should know that Sen. Richard Lugar (62; 18), in line for Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee, has the strong approval of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce (87 percent rating).

Candidate Romney wants us to repudiate ("retire") Senator Kennedy — who has fought tirelessly and effectively for educational and job opportunities, for women's freedom and human rights, for public health and environmental responsibility — in the name of "change."

Some change!

Ted Kennedy may be the "devil" his enemies claim — the epitome of misguided Democratic policies and programs — but it is utterly ABSURD to say that it "will make no difference" if we replace him with a neophyte Junior Senator named Mitt Romney.

So I beg all registered voters to get off their duffs next Tuesday and CHOOSE — not so much between individuals as between two directions in which they want to prod and heave and whip an almost-deadlocked Congress.

Quiet majority speaks out

To the editor:

Call me the quiet majority. Yes as an intelligent, well educated young woman I am pretty conservative — you will notice however my political opinions are not those plastered all over campus, or on the cover of the Collegian — because I am an ordinary student not an annoying, inaccurate political representative for either side . . .

However after four years here at UMass, I've gotten tired of having political groups tell me what to do because I am a young "malleable" student. Ha! The joke is on them! I don't vote with the "trend" or because someone else decide I should.

I try to vote based on what I've decided I believe in considering ALL the information. As do many of my fellow students . . . never toting stickers, or signs, or "mail in my congressman cards." I'm writing to encourage the rest of you to do the same — in particular those who have never voted before.

How many presentations/posters have you heard in the campaigns that actually tell you the truth about issues? It is not likely that there are many, but that is not an excuse to be an uninformed voter!

Those snazzy red books are produced by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to present both sides equally — then if you decide to vote for one or the other at least you've made the best choice for you and our area/state/country. Isn't that why you chose to vote?

In the next week we will all be called upon to throw in our two cents. I would like to take this opportunity not to say "Vote Republican/Democrat/or Whoever!" but instead to encourage you to "make educated choices based on the facts, and on the values you believe in!"

Take 15 to 30 minutes to think about your choices. If you were elected, what would you do?

Nitrate Kisses to be screened at Hampden

Barbara Hammer's highly acclaimed — and highly controversial — 1992 film Nitrate Kisses will be shown this evening at 7:30 p.m. at Hampden Theater. The screening is part of the "Banned on Campus: Responding to Censurship in the Visual Arts" film and video series forum.

Experimental filmmaker and pioneer of gay/lesbian cinema Barbara Hammer will be present for a reception to be held after the screening.

Documenting the sex and love lives of gay and lesbian couples, Nitrate Kisses also examines the roles of historic representation of gay and lesbian people in the cinema. The film weaves footage from the first reported gay American film, 1933's Lost in Sodom as well as scenes from German narrative and documentary films of the 1930s.

Nitrate Kisses was recently challenged by the the Christian Coalition and the Traditional Values Coalition for "alleged misuse of public funds" and for supposed "pornographic" content.

"Banned on Campus" is a joint project of the Fine Arts Center Department of Multicultural Programs and Hampden Gallery, with support from the UMass Arts Council, Five College Film Council and the Student Activities Cultural Enrichment Fund.

The event is free, though parental and individual discretion is advised.

Branagh's Frankenstein is monster movie mush

Also: an unoriginal 'Stargate'

By Jon Lupo

MARY SHELLY'S FRANKENSTEIN
Directed by Kenneth Branagh with Kenneth Branagh, Robert De Niro
Helena Bonham Carter & Tom Hulce

There's a scene in Kenneth Branagh's deliriously entertaining 1991 thriller Dead Again, in which a pair of scissors flies across the room, then hits the ground, sliding across the floor in a gloriously improbable point of view shot into the waiting hand of Emma Thompson. It's a showstopper; a goofy, exhilarating moment that captures, in essence, the heart of this love letter to Hitchcock and Welles.

There are no flying scissors in Mary Shelly's Frankenstein, no one distinct moment that sums up the soul of the picture. It's because for all of the film's visual kick and visceral thrills, it's a curiously schizophrenic movie — careening from high gothic romance to monster movie camp to Grimm fairy tale to a creepy, gross-out thriller.

And while Branagh manipulates each of these mini-genres quite well, he never establishes a sense of cohesiveness between them. You're never sure what kind of movie it is from scene to scene and it doesn't let the film develop on its own. Branagh seems wholly unsure of the film's tone — and that translates into a bumpy, unsatisfying night at the movies.

Mary Shelley's Frankenstein begins (and ends) ominously enough in the glaciers of the Arctic north. Victor Frankenstein (Branagh) tells an explorer (Aidan Quinn, the only one without an accent) his story of how he was driven to produce the Creature, his love affair with adopted sister Elizabeth (Helena Bonham Carter) and their tragic entanglements.

Frankenstein has a break-neck pace for the first half, with births, deaths, even years happening within screen seconds of each other. This set-up is played like a giddy fairy tale, replete with florid visuals and a cheeky, campy feel. It's a decidedly smiley prelude to the darker episodes that follow, with Frankenstein learning medicine in a disease-infested walled city.

The film then confidently slides into its central sequence: a marvelously crafted creation scene that spills over — literally — with Branagh rolling around in amniotic fluid with the Creature (De Niro's at his best here; he keeps his mouth shut). Frankenstein hits its high point here, with Branagh slamming every note home, not once veering into parody. (It will revisit this apex again, not so ironically in a later, even more shocking creation scene.)

What follows is alternately cute, terrifying or awkwardly overblown. It's cute when the Creature finds refuge with an unwitting forest family. The Creature saves the family's harvest by yanking out the crop from the frozen earth with his super-human strength. And when the adorable kids leave food for the "spirit of the forest," Frankenstein assumes a gentle, almost story-book personality. But when he's discovered by the family, the Creature turns (way too abruptly) into a bizarre, backwoods Max Cady (from Cape Fear), knocking off people left and right.

Up until this point, De Niro has been hard to pin down. Sure, his face is mass of scars and stitches, but it's De Niro under the prosthetics, right? The pivotal moment comes when the Creature first converses with Frankenstein. Smack in the middle of this supposedly pathos-ridden speech, De Niro starts sound awfully like Raging Bull's Jake La Motta reciting the Marlon Brando/On the Waterfront monologue.

From then on, it's hard to take the Creature seriously, let alone menacingly. Another blunt character turnaround in the clumsily staged final scene practically neuters the Creature, leaving De Niro to ham up a noticeably inferior screenplay.

While De Niro's struggling to find the heart of his character, Branagh seems to be dying to overact — wildly and frequently — like he's aiming his performance to the cheap seats in the back row. It's a frightfully bad turn, especially in light of his past works at writer-director.

So it's left to Helena Bonham Carter to pick up the slack, which she does considerably well. Throughout the whole film, even when her co-stars chew scenery madly, Carter remains grounded. Carter is the only actor in Frankenstein that remains steady — and always believable — with every lurch of the plot. And she does what De Niro can't do in a later scene, projecting horror, repulsion and regret in one fell swoop.

It seems then that Kenneth Branagh wanted to make a monster movie, a high-gloss, thinking thriller that tapped into the soul of the original novel like never before, while still retaining the humor and chills of the 1931 Boris Karloff original. But Mary Shelly's Frankenstein is not that movie. It's Alive!...but not very well. C+

STARGATE
Directed by Roland Emmerich with James Spader, Kurt Russell
& Jaye Davidson

There's not an original moment anywhere to be found in Stargate, a completely derivative exercise in science fiction futility. While nothing is terribly bad about the film, there's nothing distinctive about it either.

James Spader plays a hieroglyphics expert brought in by the Army to decipher markings on a mysterious cylinder that people think is a portal to another world. They're right, and before you know it, Spader, a Special Forces guy or something played by Kurt Russell and his platoon are racing through the stargate.

. . . Only to be plunked down in what looks suspiciously like Egypt. Half the crew meets up with a town of natives who speak an ancient form of Egyptian. The other half gets kidnapped by the evil sun God Ra (Davidson) in his cool- looking pyramid/spaceship.

Stargate rolls along, seemingly oblivious to the fact that none of what it's doing is anywhere near original. The most fun to be found in the movie is checking off its bevy of sci- fi cliches, all of which are carried off with much more flair on your average episode of "Star Trek: The Next Generation."

And then there's Davidson's peculiar role. After copping an Oscar nod for The Crying Game, he gets to have all of his lines over-dubbed, apparently by the guy who lost out to James Earl Jones for Darth Vader. It's silly, and quite embarrassing. Much like the movie itself. C–

P.C. pop tunes from eco–friendly Samples

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

If you like politically correct pop with environmental overtones, crunchy attitude, and world music flavor then check out the Samples, tonight at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall, 8 p.m.

The Samples' unique brand of music has become a college music staple nation-wide. They are snapped up for many spring concerts and considered the band for a more conscious generation. Founded in Boulder, Colo., the pop-esque quartet is comprised of Sean Kelly (guitar, vocals), Al Laughlin (key- boards, vocals), Andy Sheldon (bass, vocals) and Jeep Machnichol (drums).

COURTESY WARNER LTD

The Samples

The Samples have recorded a total of five albums since their creation in 1987. The first album, a self-titled debut, was recorded on Arista Records in 1989. Disillusioned by the madness of a corporate label, the band decided to go indie. They released Underwater People on their own label in Nov. 1991.

In 1992 they signed on to the fledgling label, What Are Records? (WAR?) and released No Room (1991), Last Drag (1993) and re-released their first album. Autopilot, their latest effort, hit shelves this September after placing under their belt a spot on the "Tonight Show," highlighting WBOS' Earth Day Festival and moving from the Big Apple to Colorado. Their first concert in 1992 drew 6,000 people and by the summer of 1993 record sales topped 150,000 through their indie label.

The band believes that Autopilot is their best album to date. The album's 11 tracks are tinged with explosive energy and a variety of ideas. It symbolizes the feeling the band had during their last tour which left them mentally and physically drained. If anything, Autopilot is a celebration of freedom and a chance to let the Samples run wild and at the same time work as a collective whole.

They also have a home video release, and are starting a year long national tour to promote Autopilot. Their home video, Ten Wheels, is a 32 minute documentary about their life on the go, from interviews and shows to private moments with each other. Included is a video to the song "Everytime" off the album Last Drag. This video was created for the fans to get a look at the band behind the scenes, as well as being able to view some exclusive live performances.

"It's a cool way to learn about the band for those who don't know us," said drummer Jeep Machnichol. "There's plenty for our fans to see as well."

The Samples will play John M. Greene Hall at Smith College tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets $14.50/Adv.; available at For the Record in Amherst, About Music in Greenfield and Tickets Unlimited in the Student Union.

Slacker director scheduled to speak

Distinguished Visitors Program welcomes Richard Linklater

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Twentysomethings, Generation X, Slackers. While most of these terms have been created by a label-hungry media, desperately looking to define an emerging generation, the latter of them stems from something entirely different.

Thanks to 32-year-old self-taught writer, director and producer Richard Linklater, the term "slacker" may be one of the most overused and misconstrued expressions to emerge in some time. His brilliant 1991 debut film of the same title unleashed the word upon a mainstream just waiting for a juicy buzzword to splash across magazine covers everywhere.

Made with a budget that was scrapped together from friends and family, Linklater managed to turn Slacker, his vision of eccentric college graduates waiting for their calling in Austin, Tex., into a critically-acclaimed cult hit. And although he probably wasn't looking to be pegged with the tiresome misnomer of "spokesperson of a generation," Linklater did manage to establish himself as one of America's premiere young (not to mention gifted) directors.

Further cementing his already sparkling reputation as a "young" filmmaker, Linklater went on to make his follow- up, Dazed And Confused, a testament to the ultimate facet of teenage life: high school.

Set in the 1970s (the very era that Linklater himself grew up in), the film was complete with plenty of good old rock n' roll, fast cars, hazing and pot smoking, but at the same time focused honestly on the confusion and boredom that goes along with being an adolescent.

Even when working within the realm of a modest-sized budget and a corporate studio (Universal Pictures in this case), Linklater has still been able to create his offbeat films without sacrificing a bit of his original and distinct style. Thus proving his strict theory that in order to create change, people must take the initiative and do things themselves.

"If there is anything we learned from the '60s," Linklater said, "it is that you can't have a little revolution and overthrow society all at once. I think a more modern notion is to create your own revolution by finding what you feel most free doing, and then shaping your so that you only conform in the most painless way. My ideal world is making movies."

Currently working the lecture circuit, Linklater will make a stop at Bowker Auditorium this Wednesday where he will discuss his experiences making both independent and commercial films, as well as offering some insights into his unique philosophies.

Classic, as well as previously unseen clips of his work, will also be presented during the lecture making it a must-see for aficionados, as well as newcomers of Linklater's work.

"Slacker" will be shown on in the Campus Center Auditorium on Nov. 8 at 5, 7, 9 and 11 p.m. Admission is $2 for everyone. Richard Linklater will speak on Nov. 9 in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. Admission is $2/general; free with valid UMass I.D.

Islamic viewpoints on multiple issues discussed by panel

By Matt Fillmore
Collegian Correspondent

The fundamentals of the Islamic religion and the issues of the world as whole were compared and contrasted for faculty and students of the University of Massachusetts on Nov. 7.

The presentation was titled "Issues of Islamic Justice in the Modern World." Issues concerning environmental protection, human rights, and international law and relations were discussed. The event gathered three speakers from the countries of Bangladesh, Egypt and Jordan.

The first theme of the discussion was a speech on "Environmental Protection from an Islamic Viewpoint." The speaker was Liaqat Siddiqui, Professor of Law at Dhaka University in Bangladesh.

Siddiqui said that while global concern for the environment has become a trendy issue, though it has been addressed in the Islamic religion for centuries.

Reading from the Holy Koran, he paraphrased the need to "protect the environment for our future generation."

Siddiqui said Muslims appear to have many of the same beliefs and values as the rest of the world. He also said environmental protection that Muslims share are the same concerns for the environment that the Western world does.

Siddiqui also said he was not here to point out the differences in opinion, rather to point out the similarities that people share when it comes to protecting the earth.

Siddiqui also reiterated that many of the initiatives sanctioned by Western scientists and the United Nations are also supported by the Muslim world.

The second discussion was presented by Mohammed Abu- Hassan, a judge in the Court of Appeals in Jordan, who spoke on the topic of human rights in Islamic nations. The first principle he talked about was "equity before law," and second the right to education.

Dr. Abu-Hassan said Islam seeks to establish a community of equality. This not only includes Muslims but non- Muslims as well. He said unlike other religions, Muslims are allowed to marry outside their religion, eat Christian or Jewish foods, other than those forbidden in the Koran, and take other freedoms not allowed by other religions.

Abu-Hassan said the Islamic high standard of equality is "not just a theory." He said in Islamic countries this notion of fairness permeates the laws and courts of the land. Among those practices followed are the strict impartiality of judges and the deference of civil law to family law. He said the Islamic religion calls for this equality in the relations with other nations.

When asked the main issues concerning the Western view of human rights in Islamic religion, Abu-Hassan said Islamic nations follow many of the same principles provided for in the United Nations charter of 1948, as does the Western world. The difference, he said, is in the ways the rules are protected and enforced.

The last speaker of the afternoon was Mohammad Talaat al-Ghunaimi, Professor of International Law at Alexandria University in Egypt. He spoke on the Islamic perspective of international law, stating that the fundamental belief for Muslims is that people should be at peace, regardless of their religion, color, or wealth.

This belief comes from the scripture and is embedded in the minds of all Muslims. He also said after many years of denial and ridicule by Western nations, the concepts of Islamic law are "starting to spread in value" in the international law community.

The spirit of the music in the African Diaspora

SHEILA'S DAY
Rand Theater
Nov. 5

"There was a sense of unity, a sense of community, and a sense of hope in the music," said the Qedusizi, a character in the play Sheila's Day.

The spiritual foundations and mental guidance that music has provided for people throughout history is quasi- impossible to describe in mere written words.

The performance puts forth a fantastic analogy drawing from the consequences of racial oppression in South Africa and in the United States. The chronological evolution of the play focuses on the simultaneous call to different forms of resistance to a common antagonistic force, namely, that behind the thrust of apartheid.

Contrary to conventional paternalistic patterns of rationali- zation, it has been the women's voice that has provided the spark needed for the blaze to roar. Such were the cases in the freedom struggles of South African Blacks and that of African Americans. The involvement of the men really begins when they realize that the women's strength must be protected.

Sheila's Day exemplifies this concept by bringing together the forces of South African women and Black American women. The rallying cries for end to injustice, the spiritual songs that function as incentives to resistance, the musical melodies behind the songs that make even a foreigner to the culture feel chills flow down slowly from head to toe.

Sheila is the name that South African house workers were given by their wealthy employers, the White women. The latter, not able to pronounce the names of the Black domestics, gave the workers the simpler denomination, "Sheila." Thus, Sheila's Day is no other than Thursday, the day all the South African "Sheilas" had off.

As theater director Sydne Mahone affirms, this day was "also the day when they come together in women-only prayer circles to heal and renew their spirits through prayer, song, and personal testimony."

This also happened in the United States in the innumerable Southern Black Churches. We see the relation between two different and unique, yet similarly juxtaposing voices emanating from one and the same source, Africa. In this way, the voices give reason and symbolism to the notion of the African Diaspora. The music and song in turn transformed the voices into a movement for freedom in both lands; in South Africa we see the coming to light of African National Congress (ANC), the Pan-African Congress (PAC), and even the powerful rise of Steven Biko's Black Consciousness.

In the United States, of course, we see the birth of the Civil Rights movement and its representative organizations, such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Souther Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), and countless others.

Both movements symbolize a global cra of resistance to oppression that the world was witnessing, and that the Western hemisphere was terrified about. White world "democracy," also known as supremacy to a vast majority, was being warned for termination.

The thousands of Black bodies lining the dirty streets of the Bantustans and those flowing down the muddy Southern rivers were not only to be remembered — they were to be kept alive, lest anyone try to forget the realities cleverly disguised under the covers of White technology, civilization, or democracy.

Thus we can finally come back to the song and the music, the catalysts, the foundations behind the plight of the people. From the Negro Spiritual born in the deep Southern churches to the hymns and melodies born in the cemeteries of the South African Black townships, the freedom spirit arises and is inhaled by each and every Black soul.

"In Sheila's Day," Mahone said, "music is used to bridge the cultures of black America and black South Africa, providing a framework for viewing the parallels that bind the struggle for liberation on both continents."

The song and the music are geographically limitless; the fight for freedom and justice against White oppression, once born, is eternal.

The play, originally written by South African Duma Ndlovu, and is being presented by the UMass Department of Theater and the New WORLD Theater. The piece will be playing its last shows Nov. 9-12.

Casa Dominicana: community-rooted, achieving outside voice

By William Davila
Collegian Correspondent

On Oct. 5, 1993, Casa Dominicana achieved Registered Student Organization status. This organization was established less than two years ago.

The sentiment that inspired these students to take actions toward becoming a recognized organization did not start on that date. It definitely was not just a recent sentiment or a fly-by-night movement. The Dominican community on campus was increasing and continues to grow. As a result, they realized the need to create a platform where they could unite as a group with a common interest and a common goal.

The steps leading up to this point, and those that followed, exemplify the ambition and determination of those who took part in founding the organization.

Among those who carried through with this ideology were Welington Bencosme who is now chairman, Belkis Alvarado treasurer, and Jenny Balbuena secretary. These individuals are merely a representation of a movement that has brought due respect and prestige to the University's Dominican community.

Speaking with Chairman Bencosme, it is obvious that the underlying theme in the organization is unity. He stresses an interest in working closely not only with other Latinos, but with the overall community as well.

Bencosme encourages non-Latino participation in the organization. The many stereotypes that have been built that biforate the Latino community from the rest of the campus population have caused a belief that only Latinos can participate in these organizations. Casa Dominicana wants to reject this notion and invite all interested individuals to come and share their ideas with everyone else.

Casa Dominicana is an organization that strives to support students through cultural activities and educational programs, among other things. By the same token, it strives to bring these same things to the general public in hopes of increasing awareness and decreasing the magnitude of the cultural gaps that divide us all as a community.

Casa Dominicana has served, along with organizations such as Abora, Concepto Latino, and MEXCA, to show the general student body the diversity of cultures within the Latino community.

The Haitiano–Dominicano event this past Friday is a perfect example of Casa Dominicana's efforts.

The success of Casa Dominicana is only beginning and can not be measured in its entirety as of yet because the organization is still in its formative years.

The Latino campus community in general is very proud of its Dominican brothers and sisters, and all that they have accomplished. This is a showing of the Latinos coming together and supporting each other's resources and putting aside any individual conflicts or disagreements that may have hindered this unity. It is an inspiration to see them take a stand and be heard as one strong, unified voice.

Today Hal introduced me to a new employee.
"Her name is Erma," he said.
Then he took her around to see the rest of the store.
She pretty much just followed Hal around and didn't say much.

Massachusetts excluded from field hockey tourney

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

For the first time since 1981, when the NCAA held its first ever NCAA field hockey tournament, the University of Massachusetts will not be competing.

The Minutewomen were ranked No. 6 only a week ago, but Sunday's 1–0 upset at the hands of unranked Temple evidently hurt them enough to cause them to fall far enough in the minds of the selection committee to exclude them from the tournament field.

"We're very disappointed in the committee's decision," said Coach Megan Donnelly. "We're very confused by the decision."

"We're very disappointed in the committee's decision," said Massachusetts Coach Megan Donnelly. "We're very confused by the decision."

The Minutewomen finished their season at 12–3–3. Their three losses are fewer than six of the teams that made the tournament.

The automatic bids, awarded in any conference with six or more teams competing in field hockey, played a key roll in UMass' exclusion.

Iowa, who has had a down season with seven losses, pulled off a shocking upset in the Big 10 Tournament, beating top ranked Northwestern 2–1 in penalty strokes to earn the Big Ten's automatic bid. Princeton, who was ranked considerably lower, also got the automatic invitation after winning the Ivy League.

California, who was not ranked nationally all season, was ranked No. 1 in the field hockey–weak West region. They also gained a trip to NCAAs because it is mandatory that one team from that region is selected.

The selection that will be the toughest to swallow for the Minutewomen will be Ohio State. The Buckeyes (14–6) entered the tournament as the fourth ranked team in the Midwest. They were ranked ninth in the nation going into the Big Ten tournament, where they were eliminated in the second round.

In the course of the season, the Minutewomen won 13 games, including No. 1 North Carolina's only loss, and one of No. 3 James Madison's three losses. Both teams have first round byes, as the Lady Tar Heels enter the tournament as the top seed, while the Lady Dukes are the fourth seed.

Associate Athletic Director Elaine Sortino was outraged over the decision.

"I'm shocked," Sortino said. "It is a tragic outcome for a field hockey team that has played a very competitive schedule all season. They had some huge upsets over top teams in two consecutive weeks. I have voiced my concerns to the NCAA and to the chair of the field hockey committee (Jacki Silar head coach Duke)."

Silar and Harvard Coach Sue Caples, who were represented on the Northeast region in the NCAA tournament selection committee, could not be reached for comment on the issue.

Anderson is a leader for UMass volleyball

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Playing one sport during the course of a college school year is task enough for anybody. Playing two in back to back seasons is almost unheard of.

Not so for University of Massachusetts senior Cass Anderson. The Phoenix, Ariz native spends her winters as a shooting guard for the UMass women's basketball team and is wrapping up a fall season where she has helped the Massachusetts volleyball team to a stellar 22–4 record, 8–4 in Atlantic 10 play.

"We're coming together," Anderson said. "We're not (where we want to be) yet, but we have two weeks to get there. We have to peak at the right time."

Anderson, who is the starting setter for the Minutewomen, said playing two sports is something she enjoys.

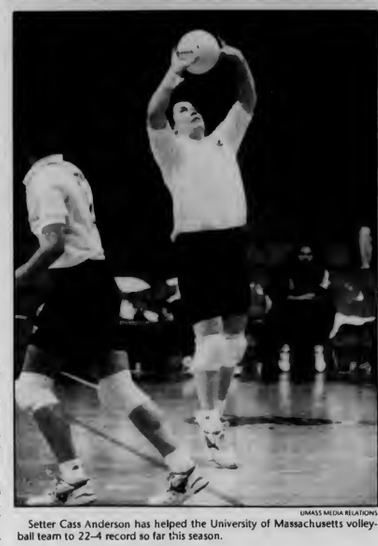
"I like to have my time structured. It seems the less time I have, the more I get done," Anderson said. "Plus, I just enjoy playing. (Basketball and volleyball) are very different, but I don't like one better than the other."

At Shadow Mountain high school, Anderson lettered in three sports: volleyball, basketball and soccer. When it came time to head to college, Anderson, who was born in Chicago, Ill., knew she wanted to come east for a change of scenery.

At the time, Massachusetts did not have a volleyball team and she was "burnt out" in soccer, so once she got to UMass, she walked on to the basketball squad.

"I knew I wanted to play basketball," Anderson said. "It was (Coach) Joanie O'Brien's first year, and she didn't have any big recruits, so that made it a little easier."

As a freshman, Anderson played in all 28 of the team's games and started in nine of them. The off–guard averaged 3.8 points and 3.4 rebounds a game. She continued her basketball career as a sophomore appearing in 16 games.



UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Setter Cass Anderson has helped the University of Massachusetts volleyball team to 22–4 record so far this season.

Last year, Anderson, an exercise science major, heard that UMass volleyball was being resurrected and elected to try out for Coach Bonnie Kenny's new team. She not only made that squad as well, but excelled for the Minutewomen in their return season.

As the only setter on the UMass team, she collected over 1,200 assists, accounting for more than 94 percent of the team total in that category. She also finished second in the Atlantic 10 in total assists, helping the Minutewomen to a 17–14 record and a place in the semi–finals of the A–10 tournament.

This year Anderson, listed as a junior for eligibility purposes in volleyball but playing in her final season, picked up right where she left off last year on the volleyball court. She is once again standing second in the A–10 in assists, and as the team's setter, she has taken on the role of team leader.

"She's the floor general, the quarterback," Kenny said.

"It just comes naturally," Anderson said. "It's part of playing the position. You just have to make sure you get the ball to whoever's hot that day."

Consistency is something that Anderson stresses as important in either sport. "So far this year (in volleyball) we've played well in spurts. In the win against GW (who the Minutewomen defeated in Washington D.C. three weeks ago), we all played together and we all played well. We definitely have our moments, but we also have mental lapses sometimes."

Anderson said she cannot look ahead to the upcoming basketball season and will take "one thing at a time." Right now, that one thing is taking the volleyball team to the Atlantic 10 Tournament two weeks from now in Duquesne and coming home with a championship.

"If we're going to win the A–10, we have to play as a team and not for ourselves," Anderson said. "We have to have self confidence. I'd like to play Rhode Island again because we haven't beaten them yet this year, and I think that we can."

The Minutewomen will be in action tonight in Worcester when they visit the Lady Crusaders of Holy Cross. They will then wrap up the regular season next weekend with two games in St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

Water polo repeats Eastern triumphs

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The best things in life come to those who wait.

One of those moments to remember happened this past Sunday in the Smith Swimming Center on the historic campus of Brown University. The biggest win for the No. 12 University of Massachusetts men's water polo team in their history occurred as they came back from a 6–4 halftime deficit and defeated the Naval Academy (9–6) to win the Eastern Championships.

This day will go into the record books, as this was the Minutemen's first repeat Eastern Championship crown and the second straight year they got an automatic bid to the NCAAs. Their 30–6 season record and the final regular season games of senior co–captains Adolfo Oliete and Javier Gonzalez, also made this occasion a definitive highlight that should last for years to come in the annals of East Coast water polo.

The departure of the senior co–captains marks the end of an era; an era in which the team began their ascension to the top of the East Coast, and will have an opportunity to be the first UMass water polo team to win a first round match in the Nationals.

The impact of their dramatic defensive shutout of Navy In the second half, and the repeat Championship they had achieved, left its impression on Gonzalez.

"For me, it is incredible leaving here as a champion. When I first started in this program, we lost in the first round in the Easterns. Now, to win it the last two years, it feels great," Gonzalez said.

"For the team, this is what we worked for in practice all year long, all season, to win this. Now we know we can play those teams in the Nationals. We can enjoy it for now but once we start practicing again, we have got to put it behind us and concentrate on the NCAAs," Gonzalez said.

The team was not alone in their quest this weekend as a small but strong UMass contingent drove the two hours to Providence. A "mini–Mullins" came to be as the crowd outdid host Brown Saturday night, in both score (8–4) and volume.

Blessings from up above also seemed to be apparent, as in Saturday's matches, and the first half of the Navy game the Minutemen weathered numerous onslaughts of both controllable and uncontrollable circumstances. In their first round match against the Villanova Wildcats, the lack of concentration due to the 9 a.m. starting time did not hurt them as they beat this tough opponent 17–10. The Brown and Navy games could have gone either way as the blessed sound of the clanging post and the swish of the missed shot barely made their presence heard over the enthusiastic crowd.

But what was definitely in control this weekend was a suffocating defensive strategy by UMass Coach Russ Yarworth, working best in the second half shutout of holeman Doug Munz and the Navy squad as well as the play of junior goalie Alex Mujica (17 saves in the Eastern Championship win).

Being in the mythical "zone" all weekend, one of the best goaltenders in the East, if not the nation, demonstrated his expertise between the posts as he continually stopped breakaway and scoring opportunities. The backbone of the UMass defense said he was looking forward to the "three– peat" chance next season, but the continued success of the team this year is still foremost in his mind.

"Our next goal is what we talked about since the beginning of the season, to win in the first round of the Nationals," Mujica said. "We got to work hard this week and next week. And when we get to the NCAAs, work for the respect we think we deserve."

Respect is the key word as the long road started by Yarworth, from mediocrity to the best in the East, has finally begun to pay off with this precious commodity. Satisfaction was hinted in his voice, but cautious at best since there are more obstacles to conquer, especially in Long Beach, Calif. later this month.

"To have all your work pay off and qualify for the NCAAs again, this is the vision I had 10 years ago when I started the program," Yarworth said. "I didn't know if we ever could do it, but we've done it twice in a row. Once is a fluke, twice means 'I guess you're pretty good.' You have got to say the season is successful right now, but it is not over."

UMass women swim to victory in opener

By Jamie D. Bearse
Collegian Staff

Not only did the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team get their feet wet this past Saturday, they sunk the Lady Catamounts of the University of Vermont in the Totman Pool, 174 to 109.

The Minutewomen swam away with a victory in the season opener sweeping the top three places in four events. They sweeped the 1,000m, 200m and 500m freestyles, and the 200m backstroke.

"This was a chance for us to let the women swim different events that they wouldn't usually swim," said UMass Coach Bob Newcomb. "All the girls got a chance to swim, and they swam better than expected."

Junior Jess Griffith led the Minutewomen to victory with 29 points of her own winning all three of her events, the 200m relay and the 100m and 200m breast strokes.

However, Griffith shared the spotlight with three other swimmers, Andrea Kosenko, Barbara Banks and Karen Sonnwald. The four combined for nearly half the Minutewomen's total points.

Freshman Sonnwald, swimming in her first meet at the college level, captured two victories. One came in the 200m freestyle and the other came when she set a pool record in the 500m freestyle. Another freshman swimmer in her first meet, Barbara Hickey, ran away with the 1,000m freestyle, beating the rest of the pack by more than 27 seconds.

"She (Hickey) is just starting to show what she can do, she has tons of potential," Newcomb said.

Newcomb said it was "more of a big deal" that the team swam well than the fact that they beat Vermont.

"I was happy with how the team swam last week in the intra–squad meet, when they broke 11 of the 13 intra–squad records," Newcomb said. "But they swam even better last Saturday."

According to Newcomb, many of the swimmers improved a great deal in just a week. Going into the meet, Newcomb said the butterfly events were the team's weakness. But Sarah Allery changed his mind swimming her best time ever in the 200m butterfly to capture first place in the event.

"I'm happy with Sarah, and she will only continue to improve with time," Newcomb said.

Newcomb was also pleased with the performance of individual medley swimmer Pam Perog.

"She's coming along very well," Newcomb said. "Sometimes she has technique problems, but Saturday she really put it all together."

According to Newcomb, winning dual meets against other schools is a bonus, but the "real focus" of the team is to prepare for the Atlantic 10 meet and the ECAC meet at the end of the season. Last year, the Minutewomen finished fifth in the A–10 but then shocked many critics when they finished fifth in the ECACs.

"We weren't even predicted to finish in the top 10 at last year's ECAC meet. We surprised a lot of people," Newcomb said. "Now these meets are just preparing us to surprise even more people this year."

Newcomb credits the improvement of this year's team in two ways.

"Our team has matured," Newcomb said. "And our conditioning trainers have worked extremely hard to get the girls stronger in the pool."

The Minutewomen will travel to Boston on Saturday to try and make it two in a row when they face Northeastern.

Mitchell believes, succeeds

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

At the time, it was thought to be all over.

The possibility of winning the Northeast region was gone. As was the possibility of making the NCAA Tournament. The lofty expectations set forth on this team, and the talented individuals that comprised it simply could not be met.

"I definitely thought it was over," said UMass senior co– captain Melissa Mitchell in a distinct Southern accent. "I was on the field after the game, practically in tears."

The scene was a gloomy one at Storrs, Conn. on this day. The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had lost a 2–1 decision to UConn, a matchup that had been labeled as a "must win" contest for the Minutewomen.

The scene signaled a time in which the individuals on the team would have to reach within themselves and find a means to turn things around. For Mitchell, a Baton Rouge, La. native with dazzling individual moves, the search within began soon after with a phone call.

"I called up (1993 captain) Paula Wilkins and she told me to make the team believers," she said. "Last season our motto was 'We believe'. If you believe in yourself, then you can help your teammates believe in themselves."

In this roller coaster of a season when such lofty expectations were placed on the team, especially on Mitchell and her role as a captain, the vulnerability to stop believing was intense. The ability to play with a clear frame of mind wasn't easy either, with the expectations baring down forcefully on her shoulders.

"I think she put a lot of pressure on herself for individual expectations and the expectations she thought were called upon her," said UMass assistant coach April Kater. ". . . Once Melissa realized the first person she has to worry about is herself, and playing for herself instead of for others, she played great. I think she realized you can't put expectations on yourself before you step on the field, because you'll never play as good as you like."

And after the squad had slipped to the new low after the UConn loss, a players only team meeting was held.

"I think we realized what our goals were at that time, and we discussed it and went from there," Mitchell said. "We talked about what we expected from the team and what we expected from ourselves. It seemed like we had so much talent, but we were wasting it."

Ever since, Mitchell has been a new player, swarming over the field in relentless pursuit. And it's no coincidence the team has made a complete turnaround as well, winning its last five matches by a combined score of 13–3 — certainly a considerable difference from the hollow feeling left after the UConn defeat.

But the hollow, sobering feeling is something Mitchell had confronted in a different capacity just a little while ago. After her sophomore season at Radford University, she transferred to UMass. "I was treated like a freshman and that was tough on me. I wasn't used to that," Mitchell said, now able to chuckle at the thought.

She would soon earn the respect of her teammates, and once the 1993 magical Final Four season came to an end, Mitchell was named a co–captain to the 1994 squad. Just like this year's squad, she had come a long way. It was a safe bet to say that it was her hard–nosed work ethic which won her teammates over.

And now, as Mitchell gears up to play the final home match of her career at Richard F. Garber Field Wednesday (1:30 p.m.) against Harvard in first round NCAA action, she can only hope to reciprocate thanks to her teammates. The same teammates that made the adjustment of the transfer go as smoothly as possible.

"I want to thank my teammates. I've only been here for two years, but I have a lot of admiration for them," Mitchell said. "I think there's a close bond between us even though I haven't been here that long."

"By how hard she plays and how hard she tries, that says thanks in itself," Kater said. "What better way to say it. To me, that's thanks, and I think the team feels the same way."

Incumbents reign supreme after election of 1994

Kennedy overcomes his toughest challenge

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — Edward M. Kennedy extended his storied career in the U.S. Senate to the 21st century Tuesday by fending off Republican Mitt Romney, his toughest challenger since he was elected in 1962.

In unofficial returns, with 612 of 2,105 precincts reporting, Kennedy led Romney 336,262 votes to 232,865 votes, or 58 percent to 40 percent.

"This is one of the high moments of my professional life," a tired Kennedy said.

He said his triumph was "an expression or view of the people of Massachusetts that the voice they want in the Senate is a voice of hope and perseverance."

The race between Kennedy, the liberal standard-bearer who won his brother John's Senate seat in 1962, and Romney, son of former Michigan Gov. George Romney, was one of many high-profile contests in a volatile national election year.

Romney said in his concession speech that a year ago he did a poll and found about 1 percent name recognition. "And those were the liars," he joked.

But as the September primary approached, the cries for Romney and change began to be heard in the state where a Kennedy has never lost an election. Romney said they would be heard again.

"Across this state, and even more across the nation, the tide of change is rising," Romney said. "Sometimes there may be some isolated little sandbags of clout and seniority and pork that hold it back, but it's going to keep rising."

Kennedy, the Senate's fourth most senior member, based his campaign on his influence in Washington and the prospect that finally, with the first Democratic president since the late 1970s, his agenda has moved to the forefront of debate.

That argument apparently worked — in exit polling, Kennedy won an overwhelming majority of the one in four voters who said experience was among the two most important issues and the third of voters who said the same of health care.

The poll of voters as they left precincts was conducted by Voters News Service for The Associated Press and four television stations.

Romney, a 47-year-old Belmont resident, blamed Kennedy's "failed policies of the 1960s" for society's woes. He said the government programs and "pork" that Kennedy touted represented society's problems, rather than solutions.

Weld wins easily his bid for re-election

By Jonathan Yenkin
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld won a lopsided victory Tuesday over Democratic challenger Mark Roosevelt to become the first Republican re-elected governor in Massachusetts in 28 years. An exit poll based on interviews with voters as they left precincts across the state said Weld and Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci would pick up more than enough support to win. The poll was conducted by Voter News Service for The Associated Press and four television networks.

Weld, who once suffered one of the worst defeats for a statewide candidate when he ran for attorney general in 1978, appeared headed for a large margin of victory.

Before the election, Weld said he hoped a big win would send a message to the Democratic-controlled Legislature that the public supports his efforts to bring back the death penalty, cut taxes and force welfare recipients to get jobs right away.

"This election in the governor's race was dominated by crime, welfare and taxes — the three issues we pretty much stuck with," Weld said Tuesday before the polls closed.

While Massachusetts is a heavily Democratic state, Weld was never in serious trouble in seeking a second term.

Roosevelt and his running mate, Robert Massie, an Episcopal minister, were both making their first bids for statewide office, and exit polls showed about one-third of Democratic voters crossed party lines to support Weld.

Before Tuesday, the last Republican governor to be re-elected in Massachusetts was John Volpe in 1966.

Weld's popularity could be attributed largely to the state's improving economic and fiscal health.

When Weld took office in 1991, succeeding Michael S. Dukakis and knocking the Democrats out of power, the state economy and budget had both sunk into deep holes.

But with the economy and state government both regaining stability, Weld did what was once unimaginable — blow out a Democrat in Massachusetts. The governor even won more support among voters who indicated in exit polls that their personal financial situation had worsened in recent years.

While Weld talked tough on crime and welfare, he also has maintained liberal positions on high-profile issues such as abortion rights and gay rights.

Those stances were key to Weld's first victory in 1990, and this year he still picked up support from four in 10 voters who identified themselves as liberals.

UM student voter turnout high

By Justin Doyle

AMHERST — The mudslinging is over. The candidates have been elected, all the issues were decided upon yesterday, and when the dust finally cleared, students at the University of Massachusetts played an important role in the results.

UMass students turned out in large numbers to polling places across Amherst on election day with the help of the Save Our Schools Coalition (SOS).

SOS, which includes the Commuter Area Government and the Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center (CSHRC), offered UMass students, both on and off-campus, rides to and from polling places.

Matthew Pavesi of the Commuter Area Government and Jason Crossland, an intern for SOS, drove students around Amherst to vote and brought them anywhere around campus they wanted to be dropped off.

According to Pavesi, the chauffeur service made a difference in the numbers of students who voted.

"I hit every polling place in town, and all the students were thankful for the ride to the polls," Pavesi said. "Most of them said if it was for the ride they wouldn't have voted."

Pavesi, a graduate student, indicated that there was a high percentage of UMass students who voted in the elections.

"Well over 50 percent of UMass students voted in the elections," Pavesi said. "The people at the pulling places couldn't believe the amount of students who showed up to vote."

Earlier in the election day, the student turnout was slow, but in the evening, the numbers of students Pavesi picked up and nearly doubled.

"I took about 15 students to the polls early in the afternoon in one half hour," Pavesi said. "Between 6:30 and 7 p.m., I picked up about 30 people. The voter turnout is incredibly high."

Crossland, an undergraduate who also chauffeured students to the Amherst precincts, was impressed by the numbers of students who voted.

"I picked up a lot of people," Crossland said. "The students have

D.C. worker awaiting results of her tests for tuberculosis

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts dining common worker has undergone medical tests and is waiting for the results of what may be a case of tuberculosis, according to University officials.

Test results will take about two weeks to be sure if the unidentified worker from Berkshire Dining Commons is infected with tuberculosis, according to University spokesman Danny Chun.

Chun said the individual is currently not working at the dining common and will not return to work until it is certain the individual is no longer infected.

It is possible the individual may be infected with another bacteria, according to Chun. There are several lung diseases which mimic tuberculosis.

After two to four weeks on medication, an individual is no longer contagious. Medication is generally administered for up to nine months.

The University will be investigating who the worker may have come into close contact with and then determine whether any other individuals may require testing for the disease, according to Chun.

Tuberculosis is caused by bacteria which mainly effects the lungs. Bacteria are transmitted through the inhalation of infected droplets of moisture — primarily through coughing or sneezing.

At one time, tuberculosis was a common contributor to deaths in the United States. With modern treatment and prevention it is not as serious a threat, but there are still several thousand reported cases each year in the United States.

Tuberculosis is particularly prominent among individuals living in crowded, poorly-ventilated conditions.

A diagnosis of tuberculosis is made through a physical examination, chest X-rays and a skin test to determine if an individual has been exposed to tuberculosis in the past.

Not all strains of tuberculosis are infectious.

An early symptom of infectious bacteria may be coughing which may not be severe, and is often mistaken for a lingering cold. In advanced stages, an individual may cough up blood.

Chun said students should not be alarmed that the food of the dining common was infected by the worker because he said the risk of the worker spreading the disease is minimal.

"It is not food-borne," Chun said. "It is transmitted through the air."

Nothing is being done special in this case because it involved a dining common, Chun said. If a case of potential tuberculosis were to be exhibited in another office on campus rather than the dining common, Chun said the procedure and the investigation would be exactly the same.

All incoming students are required to show proof they have had a tuberculosis test and all employees are tested for the disease before they are hired, according to Chun. The worker was tested before being hired and tested negative for tuberculosis, Chun said.

According to the National Institutes of Health, the risk of contacting tuberculosis is 50 percent if an individual is within close contact with an infected individual for 24 hours a day for a

Six–year–old boy dies in Route 9 accident

BELCHERTOWN — Rescue workers and firefighters try to douse the flames on a moving van after it exploded when it crashed into a tree during a two–car accident on Route 9 yesterday evening. A six–year–old boy died as a result of the crash.

BELCHERTOWN — A six–year old boy was killed yesterday on Route 9 during an accident involving two vehicles, according to Belchertown Police Sergeant William Zobka.

Police re-roured traffic on Route 9 for several hours after an accident involving a white Porsche 944 and a United Van Lines truck directly outside the entrance of the Windsor Dam and Quabbin Reservoir. The accident occurred at approximately 5:18 p.m.

According to Zobka, the two drivers were taken to Mary Lane Hospital in Ware. The boy, a passenger in the truck, was dead when Zobka arrived on the accident scene.

"The operator of the truck was outside of the vehicle with the child when we arrived," Zobka said. "The man was still conscious after the accident."

The driver of the truck, a male, was severely injured, according to Zobka. The operator of the Porsche, a female, was visibly injured, but Zobka said that the injuries were not life threatening. Both were taken by ambulance shortly after the accident.

The Massachusetts State Police Reconstruction team was on hand at the accident scene to try to determine what happened and why, according to Zobka. A spokesperson was unavailable for comment.

The truck was traveling east on Route 9 when the Porsche turned right, into the lane of the oncoming truck, according to Zobka. The truck hit the car, and continued east off the side of the road.

"It appears the white car pulled out of the entrance of the Quabbin Reservoir into the right lane," said Zobka. "The Porsche was definitely on the wrong side of the road."

The truck drove into a ravine and exploded into fire immediately after hitting a tree, said Zobka. The tree was imbedded in the driver side of the cab of the truck.

According to Ted Bock, chief of the Belchertown Fire Department, the fire was brought under control in approximately 10 minutes, but the cargo of the truck continued to smolder.

"Until we can pull the cargo out we really can't do much," Bock said. "The reconstruction team doesn't want the fire department to move anything."

Still no suspects in stabbing case

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Suspects are still at large in last week's stabbing of University of Massachusetts freshman Daniel Boudreau.

Boudreau, 18, returned to his home in Quincy after spending about three days in Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. He is recuperating well, according to his father, Walter Boudreau.

Boudreau was released last Wednesday, three days after being stabbed on North Pleasant Street. He suffered from a collapsed lung, multiple stab wounds in the side and back and lacerations to the head, Walter Boudreau said.

"There were a couple of rough days," Walter Boudreau said. "There's a lot of pain from internal damage. It's pain from recovery."

Fourteen staples were required to mend the several lacerations in the left temple area of Daniel Boudreau's head, Walter Boudreau said.

Boudreau, a Kennedy tower resident, is also recovering from three stab wounds, one on the left side of the chest right next to the heart and the other two on the back and left, also not far from the heart, Walter Boudreau said.

Boudreau was stabbed during a confrontation between two groups of young males on Oct. 30 on North Pleasant Street. No weapon has been discovered.

A shirt, which is thought to belong to Boudreau's assailant, has been recovered and sent to the lab for testing, Walter Boudreau said.

The shirt was covered in blood. It is assumed to be Boudreau's blood. If the tests reveal blood other than Boudreau's on the shirt, it may be a way to investigate the identity of the assailant, assuming it is the assailants blood, Walter Boudreau said.

Police are also looking at hospital records to find leads on anyone who was treated at corresponding times that may have injuries relating to the accident, Walter Boudreau said.

The investigation is still open and there are no direct suspects as of yet.

Walter Boudreau is keeping in close contact with the police, and thinks they may have retrieved some descriptions of the assailant, he said.

The Collegian attempted to find information on the descriptions of any possible suspects, but the Amherst Police detective bureau did not return phone calls or release any information.

Walter Boudreau is offering a $1000 award to anyone who has information that could lead to the arrest of the suspects.

"The kids [UMass students] are angry and concerned," Walter Boudreau said. "This isn't something

WASHINGTON — Angry, alienated, America's voters are turning the face of their government to the right. They got mad, as the political adage goes, and on Tuesday they got even, taking it out on the Democrats, their wrath rewarding Republicans in the midterm congressional elections.

Getting even with President Clinton, the purported New Democrat they'd chosen only two years ago to salve their frustration and revive their economy. Now times are better, as Clinton has said, over and over.

Yet as voters left polling places across the nation, they said they fear for the future, no matter the upturn. In early exit polls conducted by The Associated Press and the four major TV networks, at least half the voters said they were no better off economically than two years ago, and about a quarter said they feel it's worse for them now.

Clinton's approval ratings in the West and Midwest hovered around 44 percent. They were higher in the East at about half, and dismal in the South, 36 percent.

The voters were also getting even with the Democrats who have run Congress for most of their lifetimes. "Not since 1952 have Republicans controlled the United States Congress," said Sen. Bob Dole. "That's when Eisenhower was elected president, the Dodgers were still in Brooklyn, and a postage stamp cost 3 cents.

"One hundred and fifty five million Americans have been born since Republicans last controlled the United States Congress," the Senate GOP leader said. They had the Senate for six years, until 1986; last held the House in 1954.

As the polls closed across the time-zones, Republicans were gaining the seven seats they needed to control the Senate, but with unsettled contests still holding the balance.

In Vice President Al Gore's Tennessee, Republicans swept two Senate seats from Democrats — one once his — and took over the governorship.

"You know, I've never been in a minority before," said Sen. John Breaux of Louisiana, one of the Democrats who helped take back the Senate in 1986.

Ironically, the retiring House Republican leader, Rep. Robert H. Michel of Illinois, had never been in anything else. Michel served longer in the House minority than anyone ever had before, and leaves as they have their best year in four decades.

They needed 40 seats to win control for the first time since 1954, and partial, inconclusive returns showed enough GOP takeovers for that to happen.

Exit polling indicated about an even split when voters were asked whether they had gone Republican or Democratic. Parity was a plus for Republicans; they hadn't managed it in the overall congressional vote in 20 elections.

They were gaining governors, too, in number and in big state clout, no small factor for the 1996 presidential election. It was an election day of getting even with Washington, the Beltway denizens, of protesting the negative, nasty campaigning that became the low road standard in the midterm campaign. Getting even meant punishing Democrats, turning to the right, to Republicans, despite their own brand of negative campaigning. The mood, the malaise, the election calendar, the numbers, personal decisions, all came together to deepen the Democrats' plight. "I think an increasing number of people see government as the enemy," said Sen. Phil Gramm of Texas, the Republican Senate campaign chairman, already readying his own campaign for president in 1996.

Yet these are the very voters who had just decided against divided government, ousting George Bush in favor of President Clinton's vow to end gridlock, make Washington work again. Now they were voting no to all that, yes to another change, with a far more conservative Congress to counter Clinton for the next two years.

Clinton was braced for it. In Election Day radio interviews from the White House, final gasps in a hobbled effort to help Democrats, he said he could lead with Republicans sharing power. "For most of the past 40 years we've had divided government," he said. "... The American people have kind of gotten used to that.

Professor's pick-up truck damaged in two-car crash

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A car struck a University of Massachusetts professor's pick-up truck from behind in front of Hamlin House and Lederle Graduate Research Center yesterday at noon.

The car's grill was encaved, the bumper was damaged, the hood folded in and the headlights were smashed. There were only a few scratches on the truck's rear bumper.

Bruce MacDougall, the driver of the truck, said he probably not need to take legal action because his insurance will cover the damage.

MacDougall is a professor of landscape architecture and regional planning at UMass.

Both vehicles were heading north on North Pleasant Street. The truck had been sitting at a red light when the car approached.

The light started to turn green, and apparently the car did not slow down fast enough and ended up hitting the truck, MacDougall said.

The driver of the car, Nick Bicknell, said that he had failed to stop before he hit the truck. Bicknell is a New Hampshire resident who was just passing through Amherst.

MacDougall said he did not look into the rearview mirror or notice the oncoming vehicle until his truck had been hit.

Amherst patrolman Steve Zahn took the report, calling the accident "your basic rear-ender." He could not comment on legal action in the case.

Campus police responded, but did not handle the incident.

Even though the accident was in the middle of campus, it was on an Amherst road, so it was under the jurisdiction of the Amherst police, UMass Patrolman Peter Murray said.

Murray radioed in to ask the Physical Plant to come and clean up the glass off the street.

Bargains abound at ski club's 'snatch'

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Three days ago, the Ski Club resurrected a tradition dating back to the early 1960s, the great University of Massachusetts Ski Snatch.

About 23 years ago Ski-in of Wilbraham was invited by the UMass Ski Club to sell used ski equipment to students, according to Ed Walulah, owner of Ski-in.

Walulah said he has seen the sale, which ends today, grow from used equipment to mostly new equipment through the years. Merchandise ranges from skis, boots, apparel, snowboards, and even rollerblades and bicycles.

Ski-in has done all but one Ski Snatch according to Walulah.

Over $1.5 million in merchandise is available at discounted prices ranging from 10 percent up to 75 percent on this and last year's styles, according to Stacy Morano, ski club board member and senior political science major.

"Our philosophy is to provide UMass students with equipment at outstanding prices," Christina Mertes of Skihaus in East Longmeadow said.

"I'm impressed with the prices, they seem cheap," freshman Jessica Nemore said.

Besides Ski-in, Mt. Tom Ski Shop in Holyoke and Skihaus were invited to attend the sale, according to Dominic Santariere, president of the Ski Club and senior environmental engineering major.

"We were honored to be invited to the sale," Maggie Mercier, the buyer for Mt. Tom Ski Shop, said.

According to Santariere, the vendors paid a fee to come to the sale. Santariere said that about three percent of the sales the vendors make goes to the Ski Club.

"The sale makes about $6000 to $7000 in revenue for the club," Santariere said.

However, Morano said that the sale is more for exposure for the club than revenue.

The Ski Club is one of the oldest clubs on campus and was formed in the 1960s, according to Santariere. The Ski Club is a Registered Student Organization which provides inexpensive ski trips to the students of the University.

The club runs day trips in the winter to ski areas in Vermont, and weekend and week long trips to Canada, the Midwest, and Jamaica.

Santariere said that all levels of skiers are invited. Membership is $20 which covers the cost of transportation for day trips. Interested students can sign up on the campus center concourse.

"What I want to stress most about the club is that it is here for everyone," Santariere said.

Cult expert discusses brainwashing tactics

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Cult expert and educator Gary Eisenberg led a discussion about the deception and brainwashing of cults and missionary groups on Nov. 7 in the Hillel House.

Eisenberg focused the discussion on the Church of Scientology and Messianic Jewish groups like Jews for Jesus.

In specific terms, Eisenberg defined cults as groups of people following a living leader who makes absolute claims about seeing revelations, being a Messiah or being in possession of supreme truth.

In a cult, "you are pulled away from your own philosophies and your philosophies are replaced with new truths the group has to offer. Then you are asked to dedicate much time or money to that organization and if you don't have money you are asked to work it off," explained Eisenberg.

A cult forces an individual to relinquish all individual thoughts and critical thinking, as well as ties outside of the cult, according to Eisenberg.

Eisenberg explained that cult leaders or recruiters seek people in transition or people searching for spiritual guidance, security or moral authority.

Jews are often looked at as prime targets for cults because they are "spiritual seekers," according to Eisenberg.

A cult commonly prays in a repetitive mantra style worship, which is said to cause a person to feel high. Eventually a cult will ask for money or services in exchange for continuing the positive feelings.

Eisenberg used the examples of cults called Lifespring, Insight, and Forum to explain the process of being lured into a cult. He said these groups and others like them will offer retreats for a price. They "get you to feel so good after 40 hours and promise for more money you'll feel better," said Eisenberg.

really turned out to vote."

The voter registration drive and "Get Out and Vote" campaign may have contributed to the high percentage of students who voted in the elections, according to Pavesi.

Pavesi credited the large amount of information which students had access to regarding both the candidates and the ballot questions.

"Students were more well informed than in past elections," Pavesi said. "The older students were very well informed but I don't think the younger students were as knowledgeable about the ballot questions."

Jim Simpson, a sophomore who used the chauffeur services to get to his precinct, disagreed with Pavesi, saying that he was not as informed as he would have liked.

"I heard too much about Question 3. I think the Blue Laws are just as important," Simpson said. "I would have liked to see information mailed out, because I have no influence on how my parents felt in terms of the ballot questions in Massachusetts."

Heidi Gleason, a sophomore, said she definitely had access to information about the candidates and the ballot questions.

"The information was definitely there if you wanted to read it," Gleason said. "I thought that the voter registration drive was really successful. They went all out to get student registered to vote."

Mike Sestric and Ray Mercier, both seniors, were impressed with the chauffeur service appreciative for the ride to the polls.

"I wouldn't have been able to vote today if it [the ride] wasn't available," Sestric said.

Learning the value of sincerity

E.C. Thomas

I had gone over to a friend's house Thursday night to fetch him for a game of pool. When I arrived he was sitting around with his housemates, in a rather lethargic state.

I asked him if he still wanted to go out, for he seemed quite content just the way he was. It was a pretty direct question: do you want to go — or — do you not want to go?

There was no hidden meaning there, no gray areas, no moral or ethical dilemmas — so I thought it would be answered swiftly and with the greatest of ease. Instead, my friend tossed around the question like it was something posed during a congressional hearing.

After about 10 minutes of his waffling, and frustrated that this potentially relaxing night was becoming a trip to the dentist's, I said, "Look it's like this: say what you mean, do what you say."

Everyone in the room sat for a moment in a sort of ponderance over my words. Then one housemate looked at me and said, "That was a really cool thing to say. I'll have to remember that."

It struck me as so odd, that I later found myself puzzling over the incident. I couldn't understand why anyone would find that statement so original and thought provoking.

Why was asking for a little bit of truth such a bizarre request? And why did giving a response involve such massive cranial activity? Why was my concept so new to them?

It was a simple stab at achieving some sincerity. But maybe that is where the problem lies. Sincerity is not something that is easily achieved today.

You need only look at the 1994 campaigns to see that sincerity is a concept we no longer have a grasp on. No doubt, some of the candidates may really believe in what they tell us they do — but we certainly don't buy into that.

Saying that you believe in what a politician says is like saying you believe in the tooth fairy.

What would it be like if every candidate and incumbent was being sincere, and we could trust in that? The whole notion is so very bizarre it's hard to imagine.

Candidates' mudslinging and rhetoric could actually be replaced with talking on the issues; advertisements could actually address the issues and how to deal with them; and voters could actually be able to make informed choices at the polls.

Essentially politics just wouldn't be politics.

Even in the classic sense of human relationships, sincerity has run amok. It doesn't matter if it's a relationship between lovers, family or friends — sincerity is still questionable.

For instance, when your parents tell you they only want what is best for you.

Haven't we all questioned that from time to time? Or those infamous phone calls promised by that significant other? If only time waiting for them translated into MCI discounts.

Or when someone says they love you? I think it would be safe to say that nowadays the four letter word has been tossed around more times than pancakes at IHOP that it is hard to say when it's sincere and when it's not.

But has it always been this way? When did sincerity become such a fashion taboo? When did people stop saying what they really meant, and doing what they really said?

I have no comprehension for this line of thinking. It makes no sense to me.

What's the point of saying or doing anything that you don't really believe in. Why bother? Think of how much time and energy would be saved if we were all sincere genuine people. People who said what they meant and did what they said.

No more political rhetoric, or questioning motivations, or waiting by the phone, or worrying about the value of someone's words — or pulling teeth to go play pool.

Life just seems a little easier and less confusing that way. Why do we insist on making it more difficult for ourselves?

Educational inequalities abound

Richard H. Gilluly

In a country as ridden with "savage inequalities" between rich and poor as the United States, it is unconscionable folly to promote theories which say the reason poor people are poor is because they are genetically inferior.

The real problem is that the playing field is as unlevel as Mt. Everest.

And yet these theories have gained much new currency recently, with the latest public pronouncements coming from Smith College education professor Seymour Itzkoff, who told a newspaper that average intelligence is declining in the United States because too many poor people are having too many babies.

That's exactly the brand of blather that until recently led Virginia to mandate sterilization of welfare mothers — or, earlier, to the practice in Southern states, Britain and Nazi Germany of disenfranchising or persecuting poor people (Black and White) because they allegedly suffered from hereditary "chronic pauperism" or other hereditary deficiencies.

Most of the hereditarian case is based on comparing IQ scores between social classes, a practice that has a long and shameful history in the United States and Britain.

It is a case often based on the flimsiest of research — or in the case of England's Sir Cyril Burt, for decades the leading proponent of this position, on research which turned out to be almost wholly fraudulent, as revealed in the London Sunday Times and the impeccably respectable U.S. journal, Science.

Despite this and despite the fact many biological scientists (such as Harvard's Stephen Jay Gould) many times have conclusively consigned the IQ-test-based theories to the scientific garbage can where they belong, the hereditarians, who perhaps suffer from learning disorders, keep fishing them out and dusting them off again.

IQ tests first became popular in the United States when they were administered to all World War II military recruits.

Questions were prepared by affluent academic psychologists, who assumed, stupidly, that the recruits would all be familiar with middle-class U.S. culture — or, alternatively, that if they weren't familiar with it they must be stupid.

So there were questions on the tests requiring knowledge of gazebos, table manners and other artifacts and customs of affluent Americans.

Quite predictably — though not in the closed minds of the test writers — recruits from Southern cotton farms, urban sweatshops and other deprived backgrounds did poorly.

U.S. immigration policy for several decades after was based on the test results.

Blacks, Eastern and Southern Europeans, Jews and Asians were admitted to the United States in minuscule numbers, because these groups had done poorly on the World War I tests.

The absurdity of IQ-test-based public policy (which also included denial of higher education to many students from poor families in Britain) began to be starkly revealed around 1950 after large numbers of returning World War II veterans had their college educations paid for under the G.I. Bill and became the best students American high education has ever seen — despite their often deprived backgrounds.

The G.I. Bill was the most successful experiment in mass higher education in the history of the world, and it paid for itself many times over in higher taxes paid by educated recipients during their work lives.

That it has never been repeated in the United States for veterans as well as non-veterans is due primarily to the opposition of such misguided elitists as Professor Itzkoff.

And that gets back to the first point: that it's nation so ridden with "savage inequalities" (writer Jonathan Kozol's phrase) is manifestly absurd to classify poor people by using scores on IQ tests — which, incidentally, remain culturally biased to the core.

In Massachusetts, for instance, public school students in the affluent Boston suburb of Lexington have twice as much public money spent on their education as students in Springfield public schools, according to state figures.

Students in affluent Longmeadow get 36 percent more than Springfield ones, and Holyoke is even more deprived than Springfield.

Poor students end up in schools with inferior textbooks, huge classes, broken windows and, all too often, less competent teachers — while affluent ones have access to such perks as unlimited access to computers, school psychologists gleaming new buildings and — especially — small classes, a key factor in quality education.

When you become aware of the glaring inequalities — in health care, housing, nutrition and transportation as well as schools — then you can respond only with anger to the theories of Professor Itzkoff and his ilk, who justify the inequities with absurdly circular logic that says the poor deserve not only the inferior services they get but should get even worse and fewer services.

It's called blaming the victim.

The last ticks on the PC stop

Chris Taylor Conner

Originally, I planned this piece as a slashing-and-burning swipe against Brad Smith.

It was to be a crushing blow on behalf of all pissed off and pissed on Black student athletes like me, in addition to the affront suffered in general by the Black students of the University of Massachusetts.

Now, after much thought over the past few days, I don't feel as though I should really be focusing on Smith at all.

Why?

Too easy: Smith is only a symptom of the fever, a sign of the times.

The backlash against political correctness is the true genesis of this and other recent events.

Ironically, the repulsion of PC ideals is beginning where it started, in the media.

Had the incidents of the past few weeks occurred three years ago, when the "multicultural revolution" was at its peak, there would have been no need for the BSU to march into the Chancellor's office because Brad Smith never would have been on campus.

This is because three years ago, no major paper in their right mind would have conceived of publishing the now-infamous article in the first place, especially one in which the poor grades of Black student athletes were the focus.

Too much flak. "Time" and "Newsweek" have a field day with dueling cover stories, the Boston Globe editor envisions in that PC time. Pressure groups swarm like bees.

Alas, those golden 15 minutes we all blew off (myself included) as being an overblown, pseudo-liberal phase indeed was just that; in retrospect, some good was accomplished, even though the do-gooders were half-hearted in many cases. Now, we all are going to pay as the pendulum swings inevitably in the opposite direction.

Too much conservatism: Murray and Herrnstein, you couldn't have picked a more opportune (or should I say "opportunistic") time to pop up and ring your bell.

Unfortunately, it is a bell that too many Americans probably want to hear chiming.

It's officially fine and dandy to say that Blacks are less intelligent than Whites. After all, it's in the book, right?

Yet, just like the Smith incident, Murray and Herrnstein's work is not the real problem; it too is a symptom of the fever, a sign of the times.

Too much smoke: A general attitude is quite obviously an intangible thing, and thus cannot be pinned down by tearing the horns off each and every scapegoat that happens to wander onto the field.

This transitional period from one passing phase to what will ultimately prove to be another passing phase is frustrating to many.

The thing to keep in mind is that we are in the midst of a shift, and not yet shifted completely.

Although the opposition may be a little fiercer and a little more reluctant to give in, take advantage of the last few minutes of political correctness.

If the Springfield Union News having apologized for Smith's actions is any indicant, there's still a bit of time left on the clock before it's. . .

Too late: End of story.

Letters to the Editor

Bus driver not at fault

To the editor:

I'm writing in response to the article written last week about the PVTA bus accident at the Notch. I was taken aback by the title that read "PVTA bus hits truck" because it implied fault on my side.

Even the police have not been able to find fault because there were no skid marks and they have yet to cite someone for the accident, therefore I feel the Collegian had no right to imply fault with the title that they had given to the article.

However, if they have some evidence to back up their claim that it was me who hit the truck, I feel they should take that evidence to the police, not pass judgement through their paper.

I would also like to bring to your attention, the bad taste that the writers had in using as one of their fillers a picture of a bus with the words "watch out for that bus" in Monday's paper.

Out of all the papers that I read describing my accident, the Collegian was the only one to ignorantly lay blame.

In the Union News and the Hampshire Gazette, for example, all the facts were laid out and quotes taken but the writers never mentioned blame because they did not know that information.

No other paper mentioned my name and, when they did, it was because they learned that I was the driver taken to the hospital, not because I was the cause of the accident. The Collegian never mentioned my name, but the laid blame with PVTA and, therefore, me because I was driving the bus.

I would like to clear this information up. I was driving the bus that was in an accident, not that hit a truck. There were no skid marks and no charges made.

The police have not made any decisions about the accident, as yet, because it is still under investigation. Because it is still under investigation, the Collegian had no right to lay blame last week with their article.

Kelly Daisley
UMass Transit Bus Driver

Editor's note. The filler in question was designed and originally ran on Oct. 28, almost a week before the accident and was in no way connected to the accident.

Driving is a right not a privilege

To the editor:

I am responding to Robert Dunn's "Just like Mom always said" (Nov. 4) regarding Question 2. Mr. Dunn is clearly very cynical about the proposed mandatory seat belt law, designed to protect drivers and passengers in motor vehicle accidents. He depicts it as an attempt by the State Legislature to take away our freedom to make our own decisions.

Perhaps Mr. Dunn would prefer to be peeled off the pavement by an overworked, underpaid (or volunteer) ambulance crew, while police cars and tow trucks block traffic and create more hazardous driving conditions in a state with a reputation for hazardous driving.

While on the surface, Mr. Dunn's complaint that the state is trying to mother us by requiring us to wear seat belts may seem valid, the truth is that they are trying to protect all motorists (and save themselves a little money).

How does the mandatory seat belt law protect other motorists? In case of an accident, with seat belts, you would be shaken up and perhaps have a few minor injuries.

You would be perfectly capable of pulling off the road to wait for police to arrive.

Ambulances may not even be necessary, and for the most part traffic can continue to flow, unobstructed.

Think about this, almost all of our laws are designed to protect us, and they subsequently limit our choices. Speed limits, drunk driving laws, even driver's licenses put limits on what we can or cannot do when we are on the roads.

Perhaps it is time Massachusetts residents remember that driving is not a right, it is a privilege, which is too often abused by drivers who do not wish to have their choices limited.

Dance performance not meant to offend

To the editor:

I believe I was misquoted in the article on my work "Sadhana," in the Oct. 31 issue. You had me quoted as saying I was "glad it [the dance] brought anger..." I certainly did not mean to offend anyone with the dance, nor stir up anger. I did say that I honored the anger of those individuals who were upset, even if I did not agree with them. Most of the audience seemed to really enjoy and appreciate our dance.

"Sadhana" was an honoring of Indian culture, not a representation of it. Ranjaana Devi invited my group to perform for Festival of Lights, and we were deeply honored to participate in this wonderful event. I was hoping that it was a way for people of various cultures to understand each other a little better.

Billbob Brown
Artistic director
University Dancers

As a member of the cast of "Sadhana," I'd like to voice my opinion. This holiday is very important to the Indian population on campus and although the piece had Indian themes and motifs throughout, its original purpose was not a religious one.

The quotation of Billbob Brown could easily be interpreted with negative connotations. I was disappointed at the representation of the University Dancers that he made through this statement. I can't speak for our director but he might have meant something a little different.

Again I am sorry that our production, however well intended angered our fellow men and women of the Indian community.

Serena R. Hadsell

Editor's note: The above two letters address the same performance by the University Dancers, from both the director and a dancer's perspective.

AMERICAN HIGHWAY FLOWER
dada
I.R.S. Records

COURTESY DENNIS KEELEY

As grunge was making a huge impact on the music world a couple of years back, a trio from L.A. named dada emerged from under all the Seattle hype and garnered some attention with the album Puzzle. The album featured such tunes as "Dizz Knee Land" and "Here Today, Gone Tomorrow."

The band's second release, American Highway Flower, has dispelled any idea that Puzzle was just a fluke.

These guys can really play, and sing for that matter. The voices of bassist Joie Calio and guitarist Michael Gurley are perhaps two of the best in rock today. They have an incredible sense of harmony, creating a unique blending effect.

Songs such as "Feet To The Sun," "Ask The Dust" and "Green Henry" feature the most memorable vocal efforts on the album. Gurley's catchy hooks and interesting rhythm guitar work are dominant throughout.

The problems on American Highway Flower are that too often the solos and endings of the tracks drag on for too long.

Tracks such as "Feel Me Don't You," "Real Soon" and "S.F. Bar 63," while featuring classic hooks, get a little too "hardcore" in the choruses for the average dada song. And the voice distortion in "S.F. Bar 63" has got to go.

Despite these glitches, American Highway Flower proves to be a strong effort from dada.

It provides a formidable distraction from all the "distortion just for the sake of distortion" bands that the record companies keep thrusting down our throats. B+ (Mike MacLean)

Trax On Trax Off

Now that MTV and the Top 40 radio-listening public have begun to embrace punk rock as the coolest thing since flannel, it seems ironic, yet somehow appropriate, that Screeching Weasel have decided to call it quits.

Instead of riding the wave of popularity for the genre which they helped to develop, the band has split up, but not before releasing what is arguably the best album of their career.

Over the past eight years, Screeching Weasel have refused to compromise their sound in the slightest in order to gain mainstream recognition, and their latest release is no exception.

Never do they resort to using cheesy heavy metal guitar effects or nauseatingly over-produced harmonies as many of their contemporaries have.

At times, the music positively drips with serious, heart-felt emotion. Songs like "Burnout Girl" and "I Wrote Holden Caulfield" are examples of good, old-fashioned angst at its finest.

The band also has a keen sense of humor. When it comes to songwriting, Ben Weasel is the Shakespeare of juvenile punk sing-alongs. Who else could pen such songs as "Planet of the Apes" and "99" (a tribute to Maxwell Smart's unforgettable partner)?

The album's only real drawback is its length. At just under half an hour, the disc is barely as long as some EPs.

This is a clear case of quality over quantity, however, and because it's put out by Lookout records (the poor man's label), it should only set you back about ten bucks.

Hell, nowadays that won't even get you a Green Day ticket. B+ (Matthew Justin Faerber)

Sean Dickson of Soup Dragons

HYDROPHONIC
The Soup Dragons
Phonogram LTD\Polygram Records

When the Soup Dragons first broke onto the scene a few years back they were surrounded by a lot of hype and were labeled with a lot of potential.

It is now 1994 and the Soup Dragons (which is now more or less the Sean Dickson Band) have become a musical enigma.

Die-hard fans are baffled as to why the Dragons aren't the biggest group around, while critics wonder why they are still around at all.

It has become obvious that the Soup Dragons have a classic case of identity crisis.

While they are wondering whether they should be the Charlatans U.K., Jesus Jones, or R.E.M. they forget that they are best at just being themselves.

While a few songs shine on every album (check past hits such as the catchy "Divine Thing" or the brilliantly optimistic "I'm Free") the rest tend to be lackluster and unfocused.

Hydrophonic is no exception with the extremely melodic and catchy "Contact High" and "Hypersonic Re-Entry" rising high above the rest of the album.

Both tracks are simple in the most intricate of ways. Classic Soup Dragons. Unfortunately in classic Soup Dragons fashion, the rest of the album is pure schlock.

The Soup Dragons have fallen off hard, and attempting to jump on the funk bandwagon that is currently sweeping the nation right now.

Pitiful efforts like "Motherfunker" (the name says it all) and "I.F. Junkie" isn't going to bring them back.

With Dickson's musical direction shooting off in every which way, the Soup Dragons are destined to be no more than a really good opening act for the likes of INXS. C (Dan Friedman)

Dana Carvey to play in Springfield

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Dana Carvey, the creative force behind such memorable characters as the Church Lady, muscleman Hans and Garth from the enormously popular "Wayne's World" sketch will be performing at the Performing Arts Center in Springfield on Nov. 12.

Carvey was born in Missoula, MT in 1955 and while attending San Francisco State University, he won the San Francisco Stand-up Comedy Competition.

In 1981, after playing numerous clubs in the Bay Area, he decided on a move to L.A. to continue his career as a comedian.

The comedian has been nominated for an Emmy six times and won the award in 1993.

He left "Saturday Night Live" in 1992 to pursue a more movie-oriented career, one that is filled with it's ups and downs for comedians.

"I've learned a lot since I left 'SNL'," says Carvey. "I did four movies in thirteen months.

"It's astounding what an editing room can do, good and bad, to a scene," he explains.

Carvey also feels he has learned a lot about the differences between comedy in a stand-up and TV format, to the big screen.

"You start out in stand-up and you have total control, then you're on 'SNL' and you have almost total control because you're writing your pieces, directing yourself. Then when you get into film, you're a newcomer, so you don't have total control, and yet you're critiqued by the media as if you do have total control."

COURTESY ROGERS & COWAN

Dana Carvey

And while Carvey felt it was definitely time to move on from "Saturday Night Live," the live audience is something that he feels a comedian needs have once in a while.

"I think anyone misses it because you have a live audience there," he said. "But that's why I'll go and do some colleges once in a while, to be in front of a live audience."

"I did it for 7 years, 125 shows, but I think it was time to move on and make way for Farley, Sandler and Spade."

And while Carvey is concentrating on his film career, he is not ruling out appearing on 'SNL' completely, as he demonstrated by guest hosting a few weeks back.

"Certain aspects I miss, but I got to be in six sketches in one show, normally that would take half a season. It felt pretty good. I wouldn't mind hosting once in a while."

Carvey's new movie, Trapped in Paradise, due out later this month, has Carvey more excited about his role than previous efforts.

"For my performance, I like it the most of anything I've done.

I got to create my own character and write my own dialogue, which really helped me."

Carvey cites his comedic influences as including the Smothers Brothers, Jackie Gleeson, Jerry Lewis and impressionist Rich Little, and says that his impressions will play a large role in his live performance Saturday night.

"It's just a free-form wildness of what I do on talk shows or 'SNL,' a thousand points of characters," he says in his George Bush voice. "It keeps me in touch."

Banned On Campus exhibit on display in Hampden Art Gallery

Local artists work featured to express views against the justification of censorship

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Issues of censorship, and the various reasons for justifying it, are the issues being tackled by the "Banned On Campus: Responding To Censorship In The Visual Arts."

The exhibit, which features paintings, photography, sculpture and mixed media works by students, former students and professors from University of Massachusetts and other New England colleges, will be open from now until Nov. 18 in Hampden Gallery.

Some of the works on display are obvious in their statements.

An example of this is the painting by Sean Bayliss, which depicts how an overly aggressive feminist movement in the Valley has created an atmosphere where displaying male characteristics is frowned upon.

Other works are more subtle, yet no less powerful in their message, as is the case with Jeanette Cole's work.

The painting, which utilizes different shades of red and pink, is left up to the viewer's own interpretation of what it means, a statement for a person's right to choose.

Montford's works have drawn controversy in the area before, as his work entitled "The Lipper Constellation" brought challenges of racism from faculty and students at Hampshire College within the last few years.

Marlene Housner's work, entitled "Vaporizing Reality: Pressing Announcements, What's in Print?" explores how the media can convey concepts and ideas that are incomplete or biased, and therefore fog our concept reality.

She achieves this by using photos, headlines and other images that have been altered or partially concealed.

Featured adjacent to the Housner piece is a work by Trace Quinton Meck entitled, "You Are Who You Say You Are."

This work incorporates many of the same methods as "Vaporizing Reality" in that it presents pictures and words in the same frame of reference.

The "Banned On Campus" exhibit holds a serious message about the dangers of censorship in any form.

And while the works here may inspire, move, scare or even offend you, they are the perfect in-your-face response to the issues of censorship that many feel are hindering people's right's to express themselves.

Due to material which maybe unsuitable for children and others may find objectable parental and individual discretion is advised

Hampden Gallery is open Monday-Friday 3 p.m. - 7 p.m. and Sunday 2 p.m. - 5 p.m. For more information on "Banned On Campus" events call 545-3530.

When the wind whispers Saddam

Iraq threatens regional order

■ Arab freedom vs. U.S. Imperialism

By The Coalition for the Defense of Palestine
Special to the Collegian

A few weeks ago, as Iraq's crack Hammurabi divisions of the Republican Guard rolled down the highways towards Kuwait once again, panic swept through wicked hearts like a "khamsin" – the dreaded desert sandstorm. Impotent hand- wringing from America's unctuous paramount leader rang hollow in the ears as the wind whispered "Saddam."

Frantic Kuwaitis kicked their servants, shouting at them to pack faster and chauffeurs were not spared the whip. Managers of five-star hotels everywhere rubbed their hands in gleeful anticipation. The specter of Gulf War Syndrome loomed large in the eyes of American Army reservists, as they hurriedly called their health insurance providers. Newsweek announced, "Saddam's armed forces are again the most formidable in the region." Iraq was back.

Nothing stood between the people of Iraq and their oil resources in the province of Kuwait except a few speed bump American soldiers and the occasional grubby Pakistani mercenary. After the murderous American genocide of the 1991–1992 Gulf War, the moment of revenge seemed at hand. What would the fate of the Kuwaitis — a group of filthy rich oil despots who had called the imperial powers into the Middle East to kill Arabs – be this time?

The American armed forces blustered about launching another campaign of terrorism from the skies onto the people of Baghdad and other major cities, but admitted that there was little they could do against Iraq's military along the border. Still, the price that Iraqis would pay for their independence was likely to be once again high, since the United States never shirked from using genocidal tactics in killing at least two hundred thousand of them in two months in 1991.

More important were the sanctions which bled, and continue to bleed, Iraq dry. These inhuman measures were employed as part of the long-term Western strategy for keeping the most powerful Arab state in a condition of desperation indefinitely into the future. Children, the elderly, the infirm and all vulnerable Iraqis are dying on a daily basis as a result of these bloodthirsty privations. Even though Iraq had done everything possible to accommodate the unprecedented and irrational demands of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the other UN pirates, the United States and its puppet regimes would not lift the blockades of food and medicine to Iraq.

As the children of Iraq were being strangled by the piano– wire of the sanctions, however, "peace was breaking out" all over the Middle East. Arafat, King Hussein and everyone wanted to embrace Rabin, the old ethnic-cleanser forgiven for all his sins.

The age–old "biblical" conflicts of the Middle East are being solved. Americans are told. Swords are being beaten into plow shares, says the US President, a draft–dogging, pot–smoking, womanizer with a penchant for oily Bible–belt flimflam. Some people even believe it: it's on TV. Several important factors were being left out of the equation, however. The most important one being the Arab people themselves.

The peoples of Palestine, Lebanon, Egypt, Algeria and, above all Iraq, were being offered nothing but the merest crumbs in this unholy Pax Americana. Corrupt client–states from Egypt to Saudi Arabia to Kuwait were throwing cash at each other to oil the wheels of the machinery of collaboration. The Casablanca Economic Summit began the Israeli canonization of Arab economies, the prospect of fast cash drawing out the scum of the Arab world salivating at the thought of Shekels and colonial bakhsheesh. Occupation, Exile and Sell–out became the only subjects for positions available in the Arab World.

But, across the Middle East, gaps, fissures, cracks in the imperial edifice began to spread across the happy images on the collective TV screen. Hamas in Palestine struck the hardest blows at the heart of the illusion — the Israeli occupation thinly papered over by Arafat's tissue of a bantustan in Gaza. They struck out at the occupiers, in the West Bank, Gaza, and even in the heart of Tel Aviv itself. Hizbullah in Lebanon, the scourge of the Israeli Army, rocketed the "security zone," that portion of the south occupied by the Israelis and their SLA stooges, even as the Israel–Jordan pact was being signed.

But most powerfully of all, Iraq's troop build up and sudden reversal signaled to the world that the forces of the disenfranchised, the excluded, the Arab people were not to be ignored. The United States and its direct protectorates like Kuwait and Great Britain howled for Iraqi blood.

But other powers were reminded of the costs of the American policy. France and Russia in particular took note of the realties behind the Iraqi moves — that if Iraq were continuously pushed into a corner it would one day have no choice but to act, letting loose one grand effort against the imperialist forces, reclaiming once again their territory of Kuwait, a "Gotterdammerung" in the Gulf.

The result of such a conflagration would probably be the permanent destruction of Iraq, as Kuwaiti newspapers have been demanding. But it would leave a revolutionary and inspirational legacy that could well reverberate throughout the Arab World in coming decades, inspiring future generations to take up arms against the imperialists and collaborators.

This is certainly what Saddam Hussein always meant by his famous phrase "The Mother of All Battles," which westerners so badly misunderstood. From Toussaint L'Ouverture to Nat Turner, from Tecun Uman to Shaka Zulu, from the Indian "Mutiny" of 1857 to the Boxer Rebellion, the revolutionary example has shone like a beacon to third world peoples seeking freedom from colonial oppression. Such rebellions, even if "futile," open the psychological and political space necessary for the freedom struggles of decolonization. The "Mother of All Battles" would give birth, therefore, to subsequent successful battles by opening up such a psychological space in the Arab World.

The U.S. plan for dismembering Iraq after such battle is already in place, with borders set in the 32nd and 36th parallels, the so–called "no fly zones." In the north, a CIA dominated rump "Kurdistan" would be created, and possibly placed under the direct or indirect control of the arch–enemies of the Kurds — Turkey. In the South, a Basra–based Shi'a republic would no doubt emerge.

This is a prospect that inspires a raw terror in many quarters and gives Iraq a kind of Samson Option of its own. First of all it would undermine the legitimacy of all the existing states in the Middle East by calling the process of their formation into question — if Iraq can be dismantled, why not Saudi Arabia or the big enchilada Israel? Furthermore, the pressures it would put on tottering western controlled Arab regimes would be difficult to contain. Finally, the process would undoubtedly leave as the 'great victor the resurgent Islamic Republic of Iran.

Iran remains the great repressed secret for imperialism in the Middle East. But Iran not only cannot be accommodated in the Pax Americana, it cannot even be imagined. The Shi'a south of Iraq, if independent, would likely fall quickly into the orbit of the Najaf and Karbala trained clerics in the Iranian government, and the cause of trans–national Shi'a unity, frustrated by the Iran–Iraq war, could be largely realized.

In the Persian Gulf/Arabian Peninsula region, the problem for the United States and the world order it dominates has constant been since the fall of the Shah in 1979. Readers may remember this incident since a number of CIA agents and other Americans were detained by patriotic students in Tehran for 444 days during this period, as seen on TV.

Since then both of the major states of the region — Iran and Iraq — have been independent of imperial control, and pose a constant challenge to foreign domination. During the 1980s, this problem was solved by the Iran–Iraq war during which the United States actively supported both sides to keep the conflict going as long as possible. Readers may remember that their government secretly gave missiles to Iran, because they got to watch Oliver North on TV during that period.

At the end of the war in 1989, however, Iraq emerged much strengthened and it was only a matter of time before the United States was bound to attack it and demolish its impressive build up in civilian and military infrastructure and its disturbing educational advances. A chorus of venom from Israel accompanied the beating war drum. The Gulf War sought to bomb Iraq back into the stone ages for the effrontery of trying to regain control of resource–rich territory unjustly denied to Iraqis by 19th century British and 20th century American imperialism.

The result however, in spite of the hoopla, has been an American dominated Middle East order that amounts to little more than a sand castle on a rainy beach.

As the recent crisis over Kuwait shows, the United States is still on a collision course with Iraq and is unwilling to allow Iraqis a piece of bread or an aspirin until they bow low in submission. Furthermore, given American imperial ambitions, a conflict with Iran also seems virtually inevitable sometime in the coming decade. This double hostility is reflected in the Clinton/Lake policy of "dual containment" of both Iran and Iraq, as if in the long run such a thing were possible.

Until the United States either gives up its obsessional desire to rule the Gulf region, or until it manages to install a puppet regime in either Baghdad or Tehran (and how likely is that?), Americans can look forward to continued struggles to remove them from the area once and for all. In these battles, they will be facing not only the opposing armies and the Arab and Iranian peoples, but also the trajectory of history, the force of morality, and the power of memory.

They may find themselves facing once again a wind that whispers "Saddam."

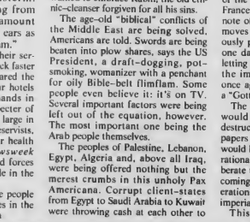
American Terrorism murders Christian deacon in Iraq

The event is another expression of American Terrorism, as the CIA intensifies its campaign of terror to bring down the government of Saddam Hussein.



Turkish army burns Kurdish villages

Dersim's Kurds fight but suffer human tragedy

■ 'Do you hear those cryings of villagers?'

By the Maoist International Movement (MIM)
Special to the Collegian

The U.S.-backed Turkish army recently began a massive operation targeting the population of the province of Dersim (Tunceli) in Turkish-occupied Kurdistan. The army has burned over 37 villages and confiscated over 21 tons of winter food supplies since the end of September.

The Turkish army has been unable to slow the advance of progressive guerrilla forces in the area directly, and is now attempting to "kill the fish by draining the pool" — defeat the progressive forces by forcibly breaking their ties with supporters. The Turkish military is following the population regroupment strategy developed by the U.S. in Vietnam.

U.S. aid is more than ideological. The U.S. has given Turkey about half a billion dollars in military aid each year from 1988–1991.

Turkish army does Nero one better

Turkish army officers have called this operation — nicknamed "Operation Rome" — the largest military operation in modern Turkish history. The number of troops in the province has doubled to 40,000. The army estimates that 3,500 guerrillas operate in the province.(1)

More than 240 villages have been forcibly evacuated, which has created 5,000 new refugees. When villages are burned, villagers are given no warning and are not allowed to salvage any of their possessions.(2)

The army has destroyed water pipes and wells in the villages, and the lack of fresh water has led to an outbreak of cholera in the area.(3) The army has also burnt down entire forests in order to flush out the guerrillas.(1)

Throughout "Operation Rome" the Turkish Army has tried to blame the PKK or the villagers themselves for the village burnings (according to the army, the villagers burnt down their homes so they could get relief aid from the government). But even the Turkish "Minister for Human Rights" acknowledged that the army is responsible for the burnings.(4) When the Turkish Deputy Prime Minister visited Dersim and offered relief aid to gathered refugees, the refugees resoundingly booed him.(5)

Dersim has been under a "state of emergency" for the last 10 years and a "state of special emergency" for the last two. Residents are banned from taking sheep herds into the mountains. Food is strictly and minimally rationed, and the army confiscates surplus food. Free movement between villages is impossible.(6)

"Our struggle is a part of the freedom struggle of the progressive humanity of the world."

Protracted Struggle

The Turkish state has denied the Kurdish nation self-determination throughout this century. Its genocidal policies against the Kurds have ranged from bans on Kurdish culture — including the Kurdish language — to militarily enforced pogroms.

In July, the Maoist TKP-ML (Turkish Communist Party—Marxist-Leninist) released a hastily translated "Urgent call to all progressive forces of the world: Stop the Kurdish genocide and the operations of fascist Turkish state". The statement read in part:

"The fascist state—the puppet of imperialism—of Turkish comprador, feudal and reactionary classes has for a long time transformed the anti-guerrilla military operations to an intensive anti-Kurdish operation in Turkey-Kurdistan. Ten-thousands of villagers who are driven from these habitation areas, are treated as slaves and are being collected in camps or they are being driven to another areas a migratory communities. These people who have lost all their living possessions, are imprisoned to a tragic heart rending life.

"The freedom struggle of Kurdish people going forward together with a tragedy of humanity. The most barbarous fascist brigades of the army of Turkish state, which has over one million soldiers, are being sent to the area and they are setting on fire, knocking down and destroying everything. During the fascist military offensives of the state up to now a lot of elders, children and women are massacred. The soldiers are humiliating the peasants in the villages and are realizing sexual abuses against women under the name of 'controlling and investigating.' All economical and social life is being destroyed consciously and systematically and the country is being transformed to an area where it is no more possible to live for the people. All properties, vehicles for working, farm animals and the houses of the villages are set on fire and are destroyed by soldiers. At this moment, all the ecological creatures and the forests of Turkey's Kurdistan are set on fire. Shortly, living and moving everything is being burned and killed. The self-determination right of Kurdish people who live under the dire circumstances, is wanted to be disappeared by a barbarous massacre in from of the eyes of all 'civilized' world.

"This is the reason that the ferocity of the state in condensed in this area of Turkey-Kurdistan. The fascist state forces who are foolished because of the military offensives of the guerrillas of TIKKO (Liberation Army of Workers and Peasants of Turkey) under the MAOIST leadership of TKP(ML) Communist Party of Turkey (Marxist-Leninist) are attacking, as retaliation, against unarmed civilians and are setting on fire the forests of the area. The military strategy of the state which is applied in the practice under the name of 'sovereignty of area' means in fact, to drive the people from the area and to massacre them. . . .

"All the world humanity is in a shameful calmness against this the deceit of 'struggling against terrorism.' Do you hear those cryings of villagers?

"Our houses are set on fire. Our winter foods are destroyed. A part of our animals are killed, some of them are lost in the field. We have not money to carry ourselves to another place and no one helps to us!"

"The young people of the world! You must not keep yourself calm against this barbarism. Protest it. Because, uncountable amount of your young brothers who are struggling for a beautiful new life and for the freedom of their country, are being killed by the fascist military forces in Turkey and Turkey-Kurdistan.

"The women of the world! ... A lot of women guerrillas who are carrying out guerrilla warfare in the mountains against fascist oppressions, are waiting for your internationalist solidarity. ...

"Democrats, progressive, intellectuals, artists, and authors of the world! Do something against this ferocity! Support the justified struggle of People's Guerrilla Army-TIKKO. Protest the dirty war of the fascist state and their deceit of 'democracy.' Don't forget that there is no way but to carry out the people's war to be liberated from this kind of fascist barbarism in our country. Our struggle is a part of the freedom struggle of the progressive humanity of the world. The people's war leaded by our Party, obeys completely the rules of the revolutionary war. It gives a big importance to [not] cause any danger for unarmed civilian targets and for the personalities who are not taking place in the war. Our Party wants from the enemy to behave in the same way, not to attack against innocent civilians. We want you come and see in its place that how the fascist Turkish Armed Forces have transformed the war to an irregular and inhumanity-barbarian shape. Force the fascist Turkish government and help us to defend the civilian targets and unarmed Kurdish peasants.

"Blame and protest the burning and destroying actions and massacres which are being carried out by the fascist state!"

Kurdish revolutionaries

In 1984 the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) launched armed struggle in order to establish an independent Kurdish state. The PKK has widespread popular support in Kurdistan. (See MIM Notes 79,85.)

"Operation Rome" is nothing new. Since 1992, the Turkish army has principally attacked the guerrillas by attacking their popular support. Over 1,500 villages have been evacuated and over 2 million people displaced in the last few years.(7)

The army also recruits local people into counter- revolutionary vigilante squads by paying them $200 a month, which is above above-average pay in Kurdistan.(8)

In all of Turkish-occupied Kurdistan there are 200,000 troops, 80,000 police, and 40,000 paid vigilantes.(9) The PKK has about 10,000 guerrillas in the area.(10)

The people's struggle advances

The Turkish Workers' and Peasants' Liberation Army (TIKKO), led by the Maoist TKP-ML have joined the People's Liberation Army of Kurdistan (ARGK—the PKK's armed force) in fighting the Turkish army.(3) The TKP-ML supports the Kurdish people's right to self determination.

The ARGK's last offensive — launched in June after the Turkish armed forces violated a cease-fire — was very successful.(10) According to a Kurdish official, the Turkish army lost 7,547 soldiers in the last few months, while 1,269 members of the ARGK were killed. Abas Tas, the European representative of a Kurdish nationalist group, said, "Contrary to what Turkey pretends, the Kurds are making advances."(11)

Una voz de Puerto Rico: 'No le debo nada a nadie'

Evelyn de Jesus

"Y de que parte de Puerto Rico eres"? — me preguntan "los de mi tierra," cada vez que conozco a un puertorriqueno en el campus.

Debo confesar que la respuesta contesta mas que un lugar en la isla y que esta trae a colacion mucho mas que esto. Y como nosotros decimos: "la intencion es la que cuenta."

"Y en donde te criaste?"— es la otra pregunta clasica.

En si quieren saber como crecimos y aprendimos a vengo de una familia ecaudalada, si fui o no a escuela privada, o si vivo en una urbanizacion de clase alta.

De las respuestas vienen las reacciones, los estereotipos, y los prejuicios. En base a estos surgen los resentimientos entre la comunidad, la ira, y la ignorancia.

El que se me juzgue sin conocerme es mi ira; tan genuina como la de cualquier persona que haya pasado por circunstancias opuestas a las mias y que se le haga igual.

Al decir que vengo de "la isla" y que vivo en "tal lugar" cualquier ignorante, tanto estudiante como personal de la universidad, asume que soy una "riquitilla" o una "blanquita," como se dice despectivamente. No solamente me lo dan a entender, sino que la actitud se percibe.

No tengo que pedir perdon por mi origen. Lo siento, pero ese prejuicio es mas humillante y duele mas que el de cualquier otra persona de "la mayoria."

No tengo que disculparme porque me gane mi lugar en la universidad y que no entre "como cuota," porque me esforce durante la escuela superior. Mi meta era muy clara.

Si de algo me siento orgullosa es de que yo no pertezco a eso de los "estudiantes desaventajados;" no pierdo el tiempo. No tengo que disculparme porque tengo el apoyo de mi familia, y que estan dispuestos a sacrificarse por mi, al igual que yo por ellos.

No tengo que disculparme porque el trabajo de sol a sol tenga sus meritos, porque a mi el gobierno no me da "ni un vellon" para que este me mantenga.

No tengo que disculparme por lo que los mios tengan o dejen de tener, se lo ganaron, nadie no los dio. No hay gobierno, no hay herencia, no hay nada.

No es justo el trato de "la nena de papi", pues mi camino me lo he labrado yo. No hay disculpas.

Lo unico que quiero que se me malinterprete. Creo en el trabajo duro, en el esfuerzo y en el que las cosas hay que audarlas.

Al tratar de entender la complejidad de la comunidad puertorriquena del tiempo pasa. Sigo creciendo como ser humano y me enriquezco al tratar de entenderla sin que los prejuicios o los resentimientos me afecten.

El olvidarse de que ese puertorriqueno estuvo expuesto a circunstancias diferentes durante su crianza nos lleva al juicio erroneo. Sin embargo, su punto de vista es basado en estas, y es tan valido como el nuestro. Eso es lo que nos diferencia del fanatismo.

El respeto es crucial, la ignorancia es la perdida. Solo escuchar y ver el porque de las cosas nos puede sacar de lo que hemos caido.

Hablo por mi, por mi caso, pero nos aplica a todos.

BRUNO, I'M FEELING LISTLESS AND BORED WITH NEW ORLEANS AND LIFE AND EVERYTHING.
SHUT OUT OF IT, JOHN?
I GET FRUSTRATED FROM LONELINESS WHEN NOBODY AROUND AND FRUSTRATED BECAUSE I HAVE NO TIME ALONE WHEN PEOPLE ARE.
JOHN, YOU AREN'T FLIPPING OUT, ARE YOU? I'VE JUST STARTED DATING CAST NIGHT. DON'T TELL ME THAT THE FIRST GUY IN A LONG TIME I MEET AND LIKE.... IS THAT AFFECTED BY THINGS.
OH, AND BRUNO, DON'T TELL ME THAT I'M CONSTRUCTED ALREADY, CUZ YOU DO.
OKAY, SO I CAN'T HANDLE A RELATIONSHIP OR LIFE OR ANYTHING EITHER BUT WHAT WILL MY AUDIENCE THINK?
BRUNO, YOU MEAN THOSE VOICES IN MY HEAD? THEY DON'T COUNT! THE STAGE IS TOO COMPLICATED FOR EVEN YOUR FRIENDS TO FOLLOW!
YOU MEAN THAT JOHN?
YEAH BRUNO, YOU'RE A LOVE CONSTRUCTED CYBORG, BUT AT LEAST YOU'RE AWARE OF WHERE YOU'RE GOING TOMORROW'S SERIES.

UMass hosts Harvard in wild card match-up today

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

After ripping off convincing wins in its final five matches of the season, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team hopes to carry that scorching play into the NCAA tournament.

Massachusetts hosts Harvard today (1:30 p.m.) at Richard F. Garber Field in a NCAA first round match-up.

The winner of the match earns the right to travel to the University of Hartford Nov. 12, the site of the Northeast Regional Championship.

The structure in which the brackets are set up has the Minutewomen, if they beat Harvard (9–3–3), going up against No. 2 seed Hartford on Saturday.

A win over Hartford would put Massachusetts in the championship match on Sunday, with the winner of that tilt advancing to Portland, Ore. for the Final Four.

While Massachusetts Coach Jim Rudy and Co. are gearing up for their second consecutive trip to the Final Four and seventh trip overall, the road ahead of them is a tough one.

And it all starts today with the Crimson, the second place finisher in the Ivy League.

"They are the surprise team of New England this year," Rudy said. "They closed up very well — besides a loss at Providence. They beat Dartmouth, Holy Cross and tied Brown. "That's some unusual results to fathom. In years past, they've been up and down, but when they play us, they always seem to be up."

As of late, Massachusetts has been nowhere but up. After struggling through the middle of its schedule, the team has made a remarkable turn-around. All of a sudden, the Minutewomen are clicking on all cylinders.

"It seems our focus is a lot better," said Rudy, noting that a 2–1 loss at UConn Oct. 22 was the turning point of the season. "Our confidence level is a lot higher, as we've saved our best for the end of the season.

"After UConn, I had a feeling we could put things back together."

It was a feeling that few of the Minutewomen players seemed to have at the time.

After the match against the Huskies, Massachusetts players were left shaking their heads as to why it seemed no breaks could go their way.

Sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers had clanged a blistering shot off the crossbar late in the second half that could have tied the match at two.

And the team continued to struggle with the "quick–strike" factor, giving up goals early in each half. That "quick–strike" factor is something that still has Rudy concerned.

"Harvard has a very good counter–attack," he said. "They scored on Dartmouth in the first minute of that match, and then scored late in the match.

"We've had a tendency to give up goals early and right at the end of halves. I'm not sure if it's a focus thing or a presence of our youth."

While Massachusetts is young with only two seniors (co– captains Heidi Kocher and Melissa Mitchell) on its roster, Harvard is as well. Its three leading goal scorers are freshmen. Emily Stauffer, whom Rudy referred to as "one of the best recruits in the nation," has led the way with 18 points (six goals, six assists). Karen Gudeman (five goals, six assists) and Kristen Bowes (four goals, two assists) are also potent offensively.

The battle in the goal, which so often decided a close match, pits two freshmen against each other as well — Massachusetts' Danielle Dion and the Crimson's Dana Krein.

The Minutewomen are making their 12th NCAA appearance, while Harvard makes its third. The last time the Crimson advanced into the tourney was in 1984, when Massachusetts knocked them out in the Eastern Regional Championship. Massachusetts leads the all–time series 11–5– 1, and has never lost to Harvard at home.

Heidi Kocher bids final farewell to Garber Field

Four–year starter to play final home game against Harvard in NCAA opener

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

When Heidi Kocher steps onto Richard F. Garber Field today for the last time, the fans will be seeing the end of an amazing career.

The end of a career that saw the senior co–captain start every game during her four years at UMass. Every game for four years.

With all the nagging injuries that can occur in the game of soccer, that is an astounding feat. It is a tribute to how great a player she is, and has been, for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team.

"We rarely pulled her off the field in matches either," said UMass Coach Jim Rudy about Kocher playing every game. "To me that's big time. If you had a whole team that was like that for four years, shoot, you have to have success."

Kocher has never been the flashy type. She is not the type of player who stands out on the field. What she has been is one of the most steady and reliable performers UMass has ever had. She gets the job done.

"Heidi's just been incredibly valuable to the program since she's been here," Rudy said. "She's totally durable and very, very efficient."

"I'm not a flashy player," the senior defender said. "I'm not going to draw the attention from everybody. I don't score that goal or have that assist every game. I'm there to do a job and the job is not to be the main scorer of the team."

Even though she is not the top gun on the field, she still is tied with Erin Lynch for fourth on the team in total points with 12 (2 goals, 8 assists). And last year, she had four goals and five assists for 13 points.

"She's established a mark as one of the better attacking defenders [in the country]," Rudy said.

Not only has Kocher left her mark as a great player, but she has left a mark as an outstanding person.

"I wish her all the best. She deserves it," Rudy said. "She deserves all the good things that she gets. She thinks good thoughts and she does good deeds. She's the total package. We'll miss her immensely. We'll miss her personality, she's rarely in a bad mood."

Throughout the team's mid–season slump, Kocher has been one of the few players who have performed well. "She's been so steady, very steady, all year," Rudy said.

Now that the team has gotten over its slump and is playing great soccer again, Kocher and her teammates are looking forward to the NCAAs, which just a little while ago seemed unreachable.

"Now that we're where we are and we're playing as well as we are, you can't ask for much more," Kocher said. "We made it through the rough part and now we got the present. We get to go to the NCAAs."

The Atlantic 10 tournament last weekend at UMass was thought to be the last home game for the two seniors, Kocher and Melissa Mitchell. But now, with the Minutewomen hosting Harvard, Kocher has a real chance to say goodbye to the field that has been host to many great games by No. 9.

"It's great to be able to get another game there," she said. "I just want to win and finish on a great feeling."

If the team does finish on a high note, they will head to Hartford to play the Hawks in the Northeast Regional Final Four. After that it would be off to Portland for the NCAA Final Four. Kocher said she believes that the possibility of going to the Final Four is not out of reach.

"I think we definitely have a shot at it [the National Championship]," she said. "We just have to take one game at a time, win each one, and we will have a really good chance."

When the soccer season finally does end, not only will the team and the fans miss her, but Kocher herself, will miss her teammates and the feeling of pride that comes with playing soccer for UMass.

"Being able to play for a school that has such a tradition with soccer, it's just a great thing just to be able to be a part of that," she said. "I've got to do that all four years that I've been here. [Coming here] I just wanted to play and be a part of a team because I think that's the best part of playing.

"You can't play the game of soccer without your teammates. The team brings you so much it's something that you can't even describe. It's something that you just have to be a part of to even know. And the girls here are just great people."

Kocher said she will also miss Rudy.

"He's an excellent coach. He knows his stuff. He really knows how to have a team play well," Kocher said. "He's done a great job for me. He knew where my strengths were and I've played well."

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Seniors Heidi Kocher (pictured) and Melissa Mitchell will play their final home game today at 1:30 p.m. at Richard F. Garber Field in the first round of the NCAAs.

Patriots' losing may lead Parcells to an early retirement from coaching

Bill Parcells was checked into Massachusetts General Hospital last Thursday for lightheadedness. This is not good.

He takes stress tests. His belly seems to just get bigger. His team is 3–6. His team had sky–high expectations at the start of the year. The expectations have not been met.

As a die–hard Patriots fan, I am concerned. Hands down, Parcells is one of the top three coaches in the league. And now I pose a burning question — how much more can he take?

The way I look at it, it's similar to my past career as a pro wrestler. Once I slapped the figure–four leglock on an opponent, it was just matter of time until submission.

Will Parcells submit after the season? Most times, a health problem can put things in perspective, and this very well could be the case with Parcells. No doubt, it will be interesting to follow.

Mike Reiss on the NFL

While there are many Pats fans on campus and they are the main priority, my secretary continues to pile upon me a bulk of letters from disgruntled New York Giants fans. They want some press. Well, just like New England, there's not much positive news to report. After a 3–0 start, the G–men have dropped six straight. Ouch.

About a month ago, I posed the question "what makes a quarterback the best of all time?" After some extensive research, I think I have an answer for you loyal readers.

What makes the best a quarterback "the best of all time" is continued excellence over a long period of time regardless of the circumstances. With that in mind, Joe Montana is the "best of all time" (more on this future weeks).

Now, let's span the roladex of the mind: The Raiders have been a disappointment at 4–5, but how about the clubs at 7– 2? Cleveland and Philadelphia continue to surprise. Minnesota has quietly gone atop the NFC Central, and Miami is in control of the AFC East. San Francisco and San Diego are the other teams at 7–2.

Who, at the start of the year, would have thought that this Sunday's game between the Browns and Eagles would have such meaning? Certainly not me. They are two of the most boring teams in the league, but hey, you've got to tip your cap to them because they win. And that's what it's all about.

What has happened to Houston? The Oilers are 1–8, and have the same record as the Bengals. Oh, by the way, Cincy picked up its first win this weekend, beating Seattle 20–17 in OT. Was that why I heard Southwest erupt on Sunday afternoon? Houston and Cincy meet up this Sunday, so someone tell security to beef up the personnel.

Moving on to other issues around the NFL, the battle of the NFC, or should I say the entire league, is coming up on Sunday when Dallas (7–1) travels to San Francisco. A Cowboys fan has informed me that wide receiver Alvin Harper is most likely out for the game. This leaves the Cowboys without a deep threat.

It is here where I chip in with the old "good teams find a way to win" and "good teams find a way to overcome adversity" lines. It should be a great game, and I'm going with the 49ers. In fact, I hope Dallas gets pounded into the ground.

Speaking of getting pounded into the ground, let's touch briefly on tailgating. My father (Double R) was in town this Saturday, and yes, once again he proved he's a legend when it comes to the tailgating spread. He sets up shop in E–lot at the UMass football game, and what else does he do?

He pulls a table out of the backseat of his car, fires up the grill, and starts offering hamburgers (free of charge) to some members of the softball team who were selling game cards. All this, and he didn't even ask for a game card, which certainly would have been fair compensation for the juicy, plump burgers he was grilling. For ethical family purposes, I will not mention what Double R was drinking on this afternoon.

With that sparkling performance, Double R now overtakes brother Doogie in the Tailgater of the Year poll. But this race does stretch outside the family ranks, as Scotty (he of the Boyden Building) checks in at the third spot. Rumor from his lot in Foxboro is that his marinated barbecued chicken is something to behold.

Note: Any write–in ballots for Tailgater of the Year can be sent down to the Collegian, typed up on why you are deserving for the honor.

In two weeks I will be traveling into Foxboro for the Pats/Chargers game. It is there where I can only hope to duplicate my record 40 burgers flipped, set in 1993. And it is there where the essence of a Sunday afternoon is felt, as the smell of the barbecue stays with you throughout the afternoon. It's tailgating at its best.

Mike Reiss is a Collegian columnist.

Tony Barbee- Marathon Oil

When the University of Massachusetts takes the floor for its first exhibition game tonight against Marathon Basketball, there will be a familiar face sulting up for the visitors.

UMass' third leading all–time scorer Tony Barbee is on this year's Marathon squad. After graduating in 1993, the Minuteman forward played a year of professional basketball in Spain before joining Marathon this year. In Tuesday's game against Syracuse, the former Minuteman had 13 points in 17 minutes.

Senior guard Mike Williams will not play as he is serving the first game of his three game suspension, which Massachusetts Coach John Calipari imposed for academic reasons.

Tipoff is at 7 p.m.

Trades leave Heat sporting a new image

MIAMI (AP) — At the outset, the Miami Heat adopted a philosophy of building with youth through the draft. The result was mediocrity.

Now, at the start of the team's seventh season, Miami will try a different way to win. With two major trades in less than a week, the long–stagnant Heat have acquired two established veterans and revamped their lineup.

The only holdover from the end of last season is leading scorer Glen Rice. The other likely starters will be guards Bimbo Coles and Harold Miner and the two newcomers, center Kevin Willis and forward Billy Owens.

Willis was acquired Monday in a trade with the Atlanta Hawks. Owens was obtained last Wednesday in a deal with the Golden State Warriors.

Departing were guard Steve Smith, center Rony Seikaly and forward Grant Long. The threesome played in a combined 1,098 games for Miami.

"Sure, there's some gamble to this," coach Kevin Loughery said. "We've been an organization that has always moved slowly, and this is a drastic change from that."

Seikaly and Long had been the only players remaining from the Heat's first team in 1988. In all, Miami has jettisoned four former first–round draft choices in the past week — Willie Burton and Alec Kessler (both released), Seikaly and Smith.

"It was tough to swallow, seeing players that have been around here go," Rice said. "Even though you know it can happen at any time in this sport, it's still tough."

The new Heat debuted Tuesday at Golden State with only five players from last season's team on the active roster. Management acknowledged that Miami, which has never advanced beyond the first round of the playoffs, was unlikely to get much better without a shakeup.

"We had to put our emotions aside and try to do some things to help the Miami Heat become a better team," partner Billy Cunningham said.

Local media reacted to the back–to–back deals with delight but surprise. One columnist wondered if aliens had taken over the bodies of Cunningham and managing partner Lewis Schaffel.

The two part–owners made the moves after their sale of an operating interest in the team to businessman Whit Hudson stalled. Hudson remains uninvolved with the team but still hopes to complete his purchase.

"We set out to make a couple of big changes," Loughery said. "I was delighted with the first one, and the second trade rounds out the club."

The deals give Loughery a bigger, stronger, more versatile team. Willis, Owens, Rice and John Salley are all capable of playing more than one position.

Veterans are remembered in 24–hour vigil

■ Recent death of former UMass student also remembered

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Army ROTC Battalion held a memorial service for Veterans Day yesterday, kicking off their 24–hour vigil at the Vietnam Memorial outside Memorial Hall. Among those remembered was a former UMass student who recently died.

The vigil, which rotates two guards from both Army and Air Force ROTC each hour, is to commemorate prisoners of war and veterans who have died or are missing in action.

"It is our task to be dedicated," said Air Force ROTC cadet Tiffancy Montague. "Veterans of America, we salute you. In this spirit we begin the 24–hour memorial vigil."

In attendance at the memorial were the parents and uncle of Kevin Carroll Jr., a UMass student who died last month in his off–campus apartment in Amherst.

A memorial for Carroll was conducted by Renee Gianelis, a junior army ROTC cadet. Carroll was an Army ROTC cadet from September 1992 to December 1993.

"Kevin is remembered for his sense of humor and love for the military," Gianelis said.

Flowers were presented to Nancy Carroll, his mother, by senior army ROTC cadet Jose Ocasio.

"I am very appreciative of having my son in the ceremony," said Kevin Carroll Sr. after the ceremonies. "He loved the military."

The Rev. Joseph Quigley, the former director of the Newman Center and a veteran who served in World War II, spoke at the vigil opening.

"[Today's ceremony is] in memory for all men and women who have served, and still serve in the United States," Quigley said.

Cadet Christopher Swanson then introduced the opening speaker, Major Peter Maleady. Swanson said Maleady taught at many universities including UMass.

Maleady said he is the wrong man for the ceremony.

"I am no hero. Occasionally I am pulled out, dusted off, and shown as a token hero," he said. "Half of these medals are for being in the wrong place at the wrong time."

Maleady spoke of the POW and MIA issue when he said he went on seven rescue missions earlier in his career.

"At one time I was intimately involved in the MIA, POW issue," he said. "I am having trouble talking about this."

According to Maleady, the missions were rarely successful, and emotionally painful.

"One time we got close enough to see two soldiers taken away, and there was nothing we could do about it," Maleady said. "If that makes you feel bad, think of how they felt."

He also spoke of what it is to be a veteran.

"I went to a school — 117 graduated, and then 76 died," said Maleady. "I am happy to be alive. That's what being a veteran is about."

Voters reject Question 3; most ballot questions pass

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

Voters in Massachusetts said they did not want a graduated income tax, but term limits will be imposed for state politicians. Final results of the ballot questions on Thursday's election did not come through until yesterday afternoon, with 99 percent of the precincts reporting.

No on Question 1

There will not be any changes to the way corporations may contribute to and spend money on ballot question campaigns. Fifty–nine percent of the voters turned it down, with 41 percent in favor.

The MassPIRG initiative proposed to limit the way in which businesses and certain other non–profits corporations could contribute to and spend money on campaigns involving ballot questions in state or local election.

Yes on Question 2

The seat belt law was will continue to be mandatory in the state. Fifty–nine percent of the voters answered "yes" on Question 2, affirming their belief in the mandatory state law.

No on Question 3

Student–run groups may continue to collect waivable fees from tuition bills in a close 51 to 49 percent vote. The question proposed to prohibit student groups that try to influence state legislation from collecting a waivable fee on state college and university tuition bills.

With the rejection of the question, student–run groups may continue to collect money through tuition bills. With the waivable fee, students must check a box to subtract money from tuition bills if they do not want to donate money.

Asian group acts as a resource for social and political activism

By Hernan Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

The Asian American Student Association represents the largest minority student population on the University of Massachusetts campus.

In existence for well over a decade, the group wants to increase awareness of people of Asian descent at UMass. One of their goals is to bring in all students of Asian backgrounds under one umbrella; in this manner AASA is reaching out to individuals and different Asian student groups alike.

Chairperson Vira Douangmany says the mission of the Asian American Student Association is "to unite the different Asian American communities, to be able to form relationships with other cultural organizations while providing some kind of support, validation and affirmation to Asian American students on campus."

In striving for unity among all Asian students, AASA coordinates efforts with the United Asia Cultural Center and the United Asia Learning Resource Center, both on campus.

"AASA is not an organization that sits still and does nothing. It is a resource for social and political activism," Douangmany said.

On a wider scale, AASA is a member of the East Coast Asian Student Union, which embraces about 60 colleges across the East Coast, giving a chance for UMass students to relate to Asian students on different campuses.

An issue of high relevance to the organization and to the Asian community is the fact that the University does not have an Asian–American studies department even though there is a large Asian American student population. The University of Massachusetts at Boston does offer such a program.

One of the most important obstacles that AASA wants to do away with is the vast amount of misconceptions that have been linked to the organization, such as its acting as a mere coordinator for social events.

"The leading misconception about AASA is that we only focus on social events — this is not true. We try to encourage many other forms of educational, political and cultural involvement," said Douangmany.

Members of AASA are mostly first and second year students. Among this young image of AASA comes a new energy for student involvement in their community.

Other priorities in the list of chores for AASA is to connect and show support for other minority organizations and to students of color in general.

UMass officials investigating transcript leak

■ Publicized grades may not have been from official records

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

In the wake of two newspaper articles about the academic status of four men's basketball players, published in the Boston Globe and the Springfield Union–News, the University of Massachusetts is going after the source of the information.

According to Deputy Provost Norm Akin, the University is investigating "to determine, best we can, where the transcripts came from."

According to Union–News reporter Brad Smith, he received the confidential academic information from an unidentified source.

Students who attended a media criticism class where Smith spoke last week said the reporter referred to the source as "he."

While speaking to the class, Smith distributed a copy of the academic records he had received. Included was a list of grade point averages for Black student athletes.

M. Ricardo Townes, assistant vice chancellor of student activities, said the data Smith brought to the journalism class helps the University narrow the field of possibilities as to who gave out the transcripts.

"There is a limited number of people who had access to a list of the grade point averages of the Black student athletes," Townes said. "But does it give them the name of the person? No."

Smith says the same material he received from the source was used by the Boston Globe in the story which first published the confidential academic records of the basketball players.

The university is also questioning the accuracy of the academic information the Globe and Union–News received. Verifying that the materials which Smith presented to the journalism class are not official transcripts is important in determining where the information may have come from, according to Akin.

"It appears that the Boston Globe and Union–News accepted unofficial transcripts as valid documentation of students' records," Akin said. "Without official transcripts the information is not legal."

The academic information Smith received is not official because the Registrar's Office has record of all the official transcripts, according to Akin.

"The Registrar has no record of official transcripts which were printed for any of the basketball players," he said.

In addition, the copy of the transcripts Smith distributed to the journalism class did not have an embossed University seal or the registrar's signature, according to students.

"For transcripts to be official they have to have both the seal and the registrar's signature," Akin said.

Akin would not comment on the accuracy of the grades printed by the Globe and the Union–News, but he did say that the Registrar's Office has "gone through the records" of the basketball players.

Student Trustee Al Lizana reported last week that he had seen the basketball players' transcripts and there was a "discrepancy in the grades" that were printed in the Globe and Union–News.

Junior mechanical engineering major Brett Clapp volunteered his time to help build a handicap–accessible boardwalk in Amherst's Hitchcock Center.

Ribbon–cutting for completed boardwalk

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — A ribbon–cutting ceremony for a new 500– foot boardwalk will take place Saturday at the Hitchcock Center for the Environment.

The University of Massachusetts Chapter of Tau Beta Pi National Engineering Honor Society designed and built the boardwalk as a community service project, according to Jennifer Munro, a senior electrical engineering major here at the University and president of Tau Beta Pi.

"We started working at the end of September and we plan to be finished by Friday," she said. "All the planning was done over the summer."

According to Munro, 60 volunteers — 45 Tau Beta Pi initiates and 15 members —, worked on the project. In order for initiates to become members of Tau Beta Pi, they are required to put in some hours of community service, she said.

In addition to being 300 feet longer than its predecessor, this new boardwalk is handicap accessible, allowing more people to enjoy the Larch Hill conservation land behind the Hitchcock Center on Route 116.

"It was a lot of work," said Tania Khan, a senior chemical engineering major and one of the volunteers who helped with the boardwalk's construction. "As a chemical engineer, I never really picked up a hammer before. It gave me a lot of insight into really building something."

"You wouldn't think a lot of hard work would be fun," said Rick Matte, a senior electrical engineering major.

Contributions for this project have been made by the Hitchcock Center for the Environment, the Kestrel Trust, the University of Massachusetts Engineering Alumni Association, the Town of Amherst and the national organization of Tau Beta Pi.

The ribbon–cutting ceremony is scheduled to begin at 11 a.m.

Filmmaker says 'slacker' is positive

Linklater speaks to a packed house on careers and success

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Achieving financial success and to be critically acclaimed are not the only reasons for making movies or for leading your life, Richard Linklater said last night.

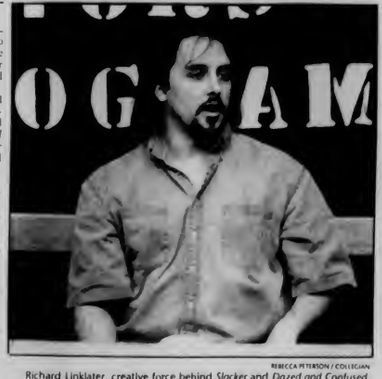
Linklater, the 33–year–old self–taught filmmaker who is the creative force behind such acclaimed films as Slacker and Dazed and Confused, spoke to a packed Bowker Auditorium in a lecture that turned into a massive question and answering period.

Linklater explained how his desire to get involved with film stemmed from an early aversion to the working class world.

"I knew from the time that I was this tall," he said, raising his hand to his hip, "there was no way I wanted to work. I remember waiting for the bus in fourth grade and seeing all these people going to work in ties, and I was like 'no way. I just can't do that.'"

According to Linklater the term "slacker" has come to develop a negative connotation. He explained how he feels that the word actually is a positive one, and that people need in fact to take time out of their working lives to figure out what exactly it is they want to do.

"So much of us spend so much time doing the maintenance of our lives– — working and paying the bills," Linklater said. "If you can do without it, if you can not be consumed, then your reward is time. I really think that time is the most valuable commodity we all possess."



REBECCA PETERSON / COLLEGIAN

Richard Linklater, creative force behind Slacker and Dazed and Confused, talked about his aversion to work last night in Bowker Auditorium.

Linklater went on to explain that by not giving in to the pressures of society he was able to successfully achieve his one true passion, films. He urged all potential filmmakers to not worry about such things as funding and the business– related aspects of the industry.

"I have this great feeling that when it is your time to make a film, it's not really about the money," he said. "If you have a film in you that has to be born, that has to come out of you then it will."

"I always wanted to be able to stay up all night, sleep late, and never wear a tie," Linklater said. "I think I've done pretty good so far."

■ ballot question results in half a day after polls close

Yes on Question 4

Massachusetts will now have term limits for the number of consecutive terms a politician can serve.

Candidates for governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, state treasurer, state auditor and state attorney general may not appear on the ballot if the person has served two consecutive terms (eight years) in that office within the 11 years prior to the end of the then-current term of office.

Candidates for governor's councillor, state representative, state senator or U.S. representative from Massachusetts may not appear on the ballot if they have served four consecutive terms (eight years) in that office in the nine years prior to the end of the then-current term of office. A candidate for U.S. senator from Massachusetts may not be on the ballot if he or she has served two consecutive terms (12 years) in that office in the 17 years prior to the end of the then- current term of office. The vote was close: 51 percent in favor, 49 percent opposed.

Yes on Question 5

Retail stores may now open Sunday mornings and on the legal holidays of Memorial Day, Fourth of July and Labor Day. Employees working at these times are required by the passing of Question 5 to be paid time and one-half their regular wages. There will be no change to the restrictions on the sale of alcoholic beverages on Sundays. The question passed with 52 percent in support.

No on Questions 6 and 7

There will be no graduated income tax in Massachusetts. Question 6 was a proposed amendment to the constitution to allow for a graduated income tax and Question 7 was the rates which would be set in the case Question 6 was passed. Massachusetts will retain the flat income tax system. Question 6 was supported by 31 percent, and Question 7 by 30 percent.

Yes on Question 8

An increased portion of the gasoline tax will be placed in the state highway fund. With the passing of Question 8 by 74 percent of the voters, the state is required to prepare a detailed plan for highway, road and bridge repair.

Yes on Question 9

Rent control will no longer be allowed for most housing units. Question 9, passed by 51 percent of the vote, will also eliminate certain existing rent control laws and allow cities and towns to adopt a limited form of rent control for a six- month period.

This law will not affect publicly owned or subsidized housing, federally assisted housing or mobile homes.

WOMEN making WAVES

Compiled by Erin Barnes

Blind woman maintains vision

Kay McCarthy has a new outlook on life. The 54-year-old West Springfield resident is legally blind as a result of a stroke she suffered 12 years ago. She believes her blindness has taught her valuable lessons.

Immediately following her stroke, her attitude was not as positive. She credits the Massachusetts Association for the Blind with helping her get back on her feet. She says the volunteers have eased her sense of isolation. McCarthy likes to keep busy by cooking and by canning jellies and preserves. She also likes to knit and fish. The MAB support group has enabled her to get back on track. In regards to her disability, Kay said, "It has taught me to be accepting. Life doesn't stop just because something happens."

Barbie has a shady past

It seems America's sweetheart has a shady past. Barbie, who has been a favorite of American girls since she was introduced by Mattel in 1959, was formerly an adults-only German doll named Lilli. Barbie's sexy predecessor hit the market in 1955 as a risque gag gift for men.

Ruth Handler, Barbie's inventor, discovered Lilli in Switzerland. Her designers transformed Lilli from a German streetwalker into a wholesome all-American girl. And voila — an American icon was born.

Environmental link to breast cancer?

The rate of breast cancer is on the rise and evidence points to environmental factors including pesticides, pollutants and electromagnetic fields as the cause, researchers say. The Massachusetts Breast Cancer Coalition has found substantial evidence linking cancer to controllable factors in the environment. Most scientists continue to focus on identifying a breast cancer gene instead of environmental causes.

Tests on humans show that exposure to radiation, automobile exhaust and pesticides, among other things, have a link to not only breast cancer but also prostate cancer, kidney cancer and an increase in birth defects. Ellen Parker, the Coalition's president, has "moved the focus of breast cancer out of the arena of treatments and into prevention and cause."

Nun's the word

Responding to appeals from religious women, a synod of Roman Catholic bishops have said that nuns should have greater, although unspecified, role in running the church but still appeared to exclude women from the highest ranks of the male-dominated Vatican bureaucracy.

The meeting of church officials made its decision after a month of debate in which American clerics in particular praised for a wider role for what the church calls "consecrated" participants.

Only 59 of the synod's 348 members were women, although almost three-quarters of the "consecrated" people in the church are women. The idea of greater power for nuns has met with varying responses. American nuns have been most vocal in pressing for a greater recognition of nuns' work.

She said. . .

GOP gains cut into Mass. power base

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — Republican domination of Congress spells trouble for the heavily Democratic delegation from Massachusetts, which stands to lose several committee chairmanships.

"Clearly Massachusetts lost some clout," U.S. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said Wednesday. "No question about that."

Kerry and U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, who was re-elected by a healthy margin on Tuesday, both cautiously pledged cooperation with the new Republican majority, the first to hold the Senate since 1986.

"The challenge for the Republicans is not to obstruct, not to say no, but to govern," said Kennedy, who won 58 percent of the vote to businessman Mitt Romney's 41 percent.

"They're going to find a vote here that certainly will work with them. . . I'm not going to abandon my commitments on these issues, but I am going to try to find some common ground," he said.

Next year, Kennedy will lose his chairmanship of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, as well as two chairmanships of subcommittees that have helped him steer federal dollars to Massachusetts.

The GOP tidal wave will cost Kerry chairmanship of a Foreign Affairs subcommittee.

Discrimination tears at armed forces

Ha! It just goes to show you — women have no place in combat positions alongside men. If the death of Navy pilot Lt. Kara Hultgreen doesn't make that fact perfectly clear, then nothing will. Everybody knows that women are not aggressive or tough enough to handle themselves in tense situations, let alone combat roles in the armed forces, right?

Wrong. It has been said that the death of the Navy's first female combat pilot has rekindled tensions within the military over the decision to expand the roles available to women, even though the cause of Lt. Hultgreen's accident is not yet known. The flames of sexual discrimination in the military have never stopped burning, and Lt. Hultgreen's tragic death has been desecrated as the military's way of saying, "I told you so."

Erin Barnes

Immediately following the accident, bogus accusations concerning the pilot's flight record materialized from numerous disgruntled male aviators. Such accusations underscore the depth of resentment some male pilots feel toward permitting women into their once closed fraternity. Lt. Kara Hultgreen was aware of the resentment of her peers, but she did not allow such insecurities to keep her from her goal of flying jets in combat.

Our military is a necessary and creditable facet of our government, but why do the armed forces perpetuate themselves as one big boys' club? The military continues to piously justify retaining regulations and attitudes which are no more than codified prejudice. The obsolete justifications made by those in command lead to the distressing conclusion that the armed forces have yet to meet real life. How much longer are we going to continue to support one of America's largest and best known institutions which, not merely by custom but by regulation, engages in the rankest form of discrimination?

This brings into question the notion that women are incapable of aggression, as the aforementioned disgruntled male aviators have suggested. Evidently women, as opposed to men, are physically too weak, are inherently biologically different in aggressive capacity, or are spiritually superior to the whole concept of violence. These beliefs are the result of ancient, traditional definitions of the female role, inadvertently enhanced by the recent effort to battle those social forces that still attack women.

During the past few decades, women have more than proven their courage, resourcefulness, intelligence and integrity in every venue from sports to the space shuttle. But the idea that women can't take care of themselves still penetrates our culture. There remain questions about how women are valued, and how we learn to value ourselves. The innocent victims of this message are those young girls who are fed the notion that strength and power are male characteristics.

We live with a distinct double standard about male and female aggression. Women's aggression isn't considered real, it isn't threatening; it's only cute. Author Katherine Dunn writes, "The problem is still the same for non- combatants, whether in wartime or danger-ridden peace: you can still get hurt, but you're not allowed to fight back."

It is not enough to say that women deserve power, we have it. The fact that the military is still deciding whether or not to "give" women combat roles only demonstrates their profound ignorance where women are concerned. Lt. Kara Hultgreen's bravery should not be sacrificed in order to justify these sophomoric attitudes. Should there come a day when the military finally recognizes the importance of women, hopefully female soldiers will shout "I told you so" as they capably join the men on the battlefield.

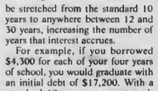
The catches of student loan plans

In an attempt to make college education more accessible to all people, the Clinton administration enacted a law with an income contingent repayment plan for student loans.

While the law has been passed, but is still not fully in place and it is not known exactly when it will be. When it is implemented completely, it will present an array of options to students to repay federal loans, and would also make changes so that most loans are financed by the government and not by banks or private lenders.



Andrew Ferguson

Although this plan is a step in the right direction, it is untested and fundamentally flawed. The many options that one may choose in repaying loans are complex and misleading.

The choices available include spreading the number of years of repayment over anywhere from 12 to 30 years or deciding to forfeit a percentage of your income until the repayment is completed.

Obviously a new graduate is going to choose the plan that offers the lowest possible payments in order to lessen the financial burden faced by almost everyone in the first few post-college years, but this may not be the wisest course of action.

To lower monthly loan payments, the repayment period will be stretched from the standard 10 years to anywhere between 12 and 30 years, increasing the number of years that interest accrues.

For example, if you borrowed $4,300 for each of your four years of school, you would graduate with an initial debt of $17,200. With a standard 10-year repayment period, the monthly payments would be $211 for a total of $25,320 in repayment (assuming a generous 7 percent interest rate). The same loan under the new plan could be spread across 30 years and the monthly payment reduced to $129.

Think you can manage a measly $129 a month? Most people with any type of steady job can afford this type of payment, so Clinton would have us believe he has made education affordable.

The catch?

By the time you finish payments on your $17,200 loan, you will have paid only $46,440, or two and one-half times the face value of your debt.

This presents us with a double-edged sword. The plan is designed to reduce payments for less than wealthy people and those of us trying to start our real lives in the work force — which it does.

Sort of.

The monthly payments are indeed lower, but interest collects for so long that the long-term cost is astronomical. If your financial situation dictates that you must sacrifice in the long term in order to make short-term payments, then the plan helps you.

The plan can reduce your monthly payments by say, $100 per month. This could allow you to live in a nicer place or wear better clothes, but there has got to be a better way than paying your loan off over 20 or 30 years.

In the next 30 years of your life you will go through immense change. You will buy a car, start a family, and buy a house. Do you want to pay student loans at the same time you pay mortgage payments, car loans and every day expenses? Won't it be great to be paying your student loans while your own kids are in college?

For those of you paying off your own student loans, take heed. Don't jump at the lowest monthly payments if you can help it. Lower payments do not mean less money paid; they mean less money paid for a much longer period of time (read: more money) due to constantly accumulating interest.

Try to select a payment plan that balances what you pay against potential future earnings. Pay as much as you can afford as fast as you can. Use your common sense, and be careful.

Or else you'll be paying through the nose until you're ready to retire.

Letters to the Editor

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please type your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

The Editorial/Opinion page will occasionally print guest columns, but arrangements must be made in advance. If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, UMass.

It's time to pre-register for classes again. Doesn't it seem like we just did it? This year's class of graduating seniors are the last ones who had to deal with standing in line to pre-register for classes. They switched everything in January 1992 and now we all have the luxury of pre-registering from the privacy of our own homes.

Why, though, are the pre-registration guides located in Whitmore? It's such a pain to walk to Whitmore, when they could just as easily dump them on the Campus Center Concourse like they do with the telephone books.

Tracy Monahan

Speaking of telephone books, why don't they come out until midway through the semester? By the time you get them, you've already called the student directory a billion times and have all the important numbers you need. The telephone book, by that point, is useless and all anyone does with it is lock up their own number.

At the University of New Hampshire, the telephone books have your local address, year of graduation and home address, just in case anyone wants to reach you over the summer.

******

I want to take this opportunity to boo the people who made the selections for who would enter the field hockey NCAA tournament. Excluding UMass? What was that all about? The team did so well all year, losing to Temple in the Atlantic 10 but still holding an excellent record and they got snubbed? They were ranked sixth last week, beat the number one and two teams in the nation, and still got dissed? Why?

Ohio State, who didn't even make it to the finals of their conference, made it to the big dance, and UMass didn't. Sorry, I don't buy the logic behind that decision. I want an explanation from someone at the top. Can you say, "POLITICS?" I thought you could.

While we're on the topic of sports, "Ole. . . Ole. . . UMass. . . UMass."

******

The latest venture by UMass is atomic clocks. How these will work is still a mystery but workmen in Bartlett Hall were heard saying something about a satellite dish and bouncing a time signal back down to campus. A nice thought, but I can guarantee you it will still be 12:16 in every room of Machmer.

For the record, it's now almost two weeks after the clocks turned back and the clocks in Bartlett are just being changed. Basically, some of the campus buildings have been an hour behind everyone. Oh, that's something new. Just call it UMass Standard Time.

******

It's time to run to Coach Cal's Closet and get our basketball sneakers that say "UMass" on them. If you get a pair, you can pretend you're on the team.

While you're at it, buy a whole fake uniform and wear it to practice. Maybe, if you hang around long enough, you can just blend in and everyone will just think you're part of the team. Oh, wait a minute, you can't buy that stuff there. Too bad — no pretending you're part of the team.

******

Kudos to George Parks for hopping into the Campus Pond to fulfill a bet with the Minuteman Marching Band. That takes guts. He must be a really cool guy to actually go through with it. Most adults are too wimpy and would come up with some lame excuse for not jumping in. Like, they might get typhoid or something, but Parks is cool. I don't even like walking near the pond, never mind swimming in it.

But at least now it's clean thanks to the efforts of Kathleen Scott, wife o' the Chancellor. So we should all make bets with our professors. I would actually try in some of my classes if I could see some professors take the plunge.

Eh.

Rosenberg thanks local voters

To the editor:

I consider it a great privilege serving the people of the Franklin-Hampshire district in the state Senate. So today I wish to extend my deepest gratitude to the voters of this area for allowing me another term. I look forward to working with you on those projects and issues that will continue to improve the quality of life in our communities.

Student defends Massachusetts seal

To the editor:

This is in regard to Anne Nwokoye's letter regarding the University insignia. In her letter, Nwokoye claims that the University insignia is racially offensive to the Native American people. She claims that it represents an arm holding a sword over the head of a Native American. She claims that it represents death.

While I applaud Nwokoye's energy in defending the Native Americans from racial hatred, the point is that the insignia is not racial in the least. What Nwokoye forgot to interpret is the most important part of the insignia: the motto. It reads, "Ense Petit Placidem Sub Libertate Quietem." While I am fortunate enough to be learned in Latin, the motto is readily available in translated form. The translation is this: "With the sword, she seeks quiet peace under liberty."

The sword here represents liberty, not the slaying of Native Americans as suggested by Nwokoye. Note law seals that present liberty holding a sword and a libra (she is also blindfolded representing non-discriminatory justice). Note also that the Native American is within the shield and the sword without. The sword is not threatening to the Native American in the shield. The motto says, "under liberty," the sword represents freedom and liberty, hard won by battle.

To get further into the meaning of the insignia, one would have to revert to heraldry (designation of points on insignias and shields). While I am not an expert on such things, it seems clear to me that the Native American represents a people (at the fess point of the shield normally used to dictate cadency) and the star (at the dexter placement) indicating a state in the Union, e.g. a star in the sky. The sword (at the helm position) represents that the nation resides under liberty. This interpretation may not be entirely correct, but it seems to equate better with the motto that surrounds our insignia than does Nwokoye's interpretation.

I take pride in Massachusetts and am equally proud of its motto. I hope that this letter will bring some understanding of it to the UMass population. Now, I invite everyone concerned to let Chancellor Scott and President Hooker know how you feel.

Political display supported, defended

To the editor:

I am writing this letter in support of the political demonstration that took place at the steps of the Student Union Nov. 2, Dia de los Muertos/Day of the Dead. I was very impressed and deeply touched, especially because I am Mexican and because I've lived in Nicaragua where American imperialism is a reality to this day.

As I observed some of the reactions from the crowd I could not believe that people were so insensitive and ignorant at the same time. After my outrage dissipated I realized it's probably not that people aren't sensitive or sympathetic to our issues, but that they just don't know. They are really not to blame, because in reality the problem is much more complex than people taking the demonstration as a joke or thinking that the whole thing was funny. The real problem is how much people know about their own government and the actions it takes in other countries.

Americans are not taught about great Latin American leaders like Sandido, El Che, Pedro Albizu Campos and others who died defending the sovereignty of their countries. The demonstration was trying to honor these dead Latin Americans whose only crime was fighting for justice and liberty in their own countries.

So to all of you who thought it was crazy, stupid or funny I can only ask you to do some research and find out a little more about the actions your government has historically taken and is still taking, not only in Latin America but in the rest of the world. Educating ourselves is the most powerful tool we have and learning to be sympathetic to other people's struggles, needs and cultures is the only solution to the continuing injustices that are taking place in the world. This demonstration made me question what I have done and ask myself if I am doing what I'm supposed to be doing and whether I could be doing more. I can only say that it was a very moving experience for me and that I congratulate the courage and the intent of the gentleman that did it. Mis respetos!

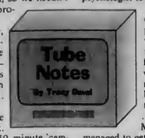
Post–politics television blues

Let us all breathe a collective sigh of relief that our beloved senator Teddy is safely re-elected, so we needn't endure any more bothersome debates, promos, or infomercials. Ahh. . . much better.

Anyway, now that the election's over, maybe Romney will realize he's been wasting his time in politics and decide to move on to a career more fitting his talents — say, portraying as a studly janitor on Fox's "Models, Inc." perhaps. Campy television shows await your shallow charms, Mitt. Go for it.



Seriously though, election themes were indeed the big trend on TV this week. Besides Romney's last–ditch, $1 million, 30–minute 'campaign–mercial', CBS' "Picket Fences" characters were voting for a new mayor, and NBC's "Frasier" found Dr. Crane endorsing a candidate who believed he'd been abducted by aliens (which is a pretty ironic thing for a psychologist to do).

And just as a totally unrelated point of election–time trivia, a few days ago I was pleasantly surprised to learn that somewhere out there, an Ed Munster was running for Congress. I don't know how he fared Tuesday night but I wish I could have voted for him. It's nice to know that there really can be life after cancellation for our best–loved sitcom characters. Now if only the cast of "Diff'rent Strokes" had learned.

Moving away from the political arena, I managed to get through an entire angst–ridden episode of ABC's disillusioned drama, "My So–Called Life." It was

Our handy, all purpose & downright nasty guide to campus fashion

whatever you're wearing... you're wrong

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst is a haven for clothing of all colors, fabrics, weaves and a complete melting pot of closet cultures. It is a place where mates can meld together in a nurturing environment without clashing — free from the discriminating sections of the local department stores. Perhaps you can identify some of these foreign elements as you stroll briskly across campus to your next class. In fact, you might even be able to relate to one of them.

Eddie Bauer, L.L. Bean, EMS look:

These strapping young men and women are often undistinguishable from the J. Crew and company because they too involve all natural fibers. The one separating characteristic is that these clothes are more often than not waterproof or originally designed for hunting.

Canvas field jackets (not to be confused with the barn jacket), rubber boots perfect for slugging around scary campus puddles, Teva sandals with wool socks, and hiking boots are the key ingredients. Now, one has to ask themselves why people insist on wearing a summer shoe in the dead of winter. Are the wool socks that warm and comfy, comfy enough to plow through inches of frozen slush and ice? They must be some socks, eh?

Nylon windbreakers for Arctic conditions can also be worn. You know — just in case the New England weather hits sub–zero proportions and has a wind chill factor of negative 6000. You'll probably be ready.

Down vests sported over Henely tees (waffled preferred) Donegal caps worn backwards (note this cap is extremely versatile in transcending category lines) and camouflage apparel is also necessary regalia. Just in case you skip class and see your professor coming toward you — be confident. You can successfully jump into the vegetation around the campus pond (or what's left of the vegetation) and not be seen. At the same time, the bright orange wool hat will keep you from being shot by various duck hunters in the vicinity.

People in this category will be mistaken for those going on the next National Geographic expedition to Tibet. They are also the ones who ride recklessly around campus on their trusty mountain bikes swerving around people and generally wowing the public with their cool knowledge of the UMass terrain.

The Southwest, Greek look:

This category is unique because universities all over the country have been populated by people dressed like this. If anyone lives or happens to walk through the Southwest area, the following clothing must be worn to insure total anonymity:

1) Jeans fashionably ripped or worn so tightly that people can say, "Hey, that's a wallet he's got in his back pocket!"

2) A "Co-ed Naked" T–shirt, your choice (and there are just soo many exciting and witty ones out there. My favorite: "Co-ed Naked Office Gopher").

3)White baseball cap with a precisely bent visor usually sporting some wicked cool team like the Cocks or *U*ass* (snicker).

4) A plaid shirt worn over the T–shirt with a few buttons left casually open to display the shirt's witticism.

5)Deck shoes or indoor soccer shoes (don't worry that you you're spending $50 on something you'll never actually play soccer in).

Now if you're female there are a few stipulations. A pony tail should jet out from behind the cap, sporting a color co– ordinated scrunchy. Hoop earrings also help define what sex you are. Also, reserve scrunchies should be worn on one or both wrists just in case you lose yours or a friend forgot hers (gasp!).

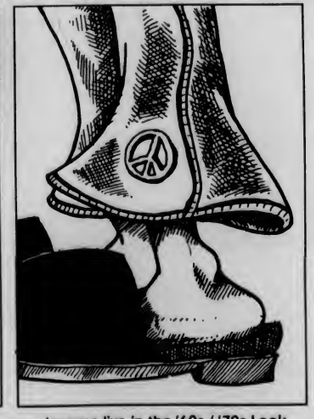
People who wear these clothes can often be seen in commercials for Mentos, in front of Antonio's on the weekend, or at any Greek party. They love to blast Frankie Vallie's "Oh, What a Night" and play lots of reggae at the ragin' kegger. If you attend one of these social functions, please remember what you and company are wearing for it is very hard to distinguish one person from another at these gatherings.

I am a stark individualist Look

"Hey everyone! I'm a sports fan" look:

This subcategory can be found at many of the same establishments as the aforementioned look. These ESPN subscribers wear baseball caps with all sports teams (sexual innuendo optional but a plus) ever created.

They have matching T–shirts, sweatshirts, windbreakers, boxer shorts and sheet sets with the logo of the team they adore. They often wear high–cut sneakers with rolled up sweat pants to achieve that "just been to the gym" flair. The book bag of choice is a huge gym bag ideal for knocking over vertically challenged first–year students on staircases.



I wanna live in the '60s / '70s Look

They are seen huddled around wide–screen TVs at bars, patting each other on the butt and roaring in unison at every slam dunk, touchdown, goal, interception, penalty shot, home run and of course fight — but only if it involves several members of a team at the same time. Surprisingly enough, most of these men (sorry they are mostly males) don't even play their favorite sport. In fact they'd rather nurse a nice cold one on the bar stool then actually sweat it out on the field.

I wish I was born in the '60s/'70s look:

Often times this can be confused with the above category because they too favor thrift shops and unwashed appendages. But don't be fooled. They are the ones who resurrected polyester pant suits, butterfly–collared shirts and torn bell bottoms.

They have tie–dyed underwear and eco–friendly shirts. The Dead is gospel and Phish is the new definition of "cool." They often sport Birkenstocks and other crunchy footwear. They also wear super–socks (see EMS for details). They line up at the People's Market for their cup of organic tea and wipe away bits of brown rice from their flowing peasant shirts.

These are the people who believe that Dazed and Confused was the movie about their past lives. Long skirts with batik print, crocheted hats softly scented with incense, and a hacky–sack are all necessary. They love a cause and will fuel a proposal to allow nudity on campus.

I am a stark individualist look:

These people are also called "I wear lots of black and I am really misunderstood." They shun sunlight and hope their skin can achieve whiteness never before seen on "Beverly Hills 90210." They adore the night and often come out in droves to smoke Camels and read manic poetry to other misguided individuals. Every so often a patch of gray will appear, but you can be sure that it's because their favorite black turtleneck is in the laundry.

A subcategory of this would be the "Look at me! . . . yes me" look. These leaders of originality likes one thing and one thing only: to look as out of place as possible. It's no holds barred in this category of wacky eclecticism. Tutus and combat boots? Why not! Evening gowns and a wet suit? Made you look!

Sometimes you'd think that these people did it on purpose. But they'll swear they didn't (almost as often as they swear they aren't rebelling against society and all it's kooky ideals). The only drawback to this mode of dress is Halloween — when they look like everybody else (gasp!).

J. Crew–GAP–Banana Republic look:

This look is inspired by the type of clothing available at all these stores. Their creed: authentic, no–frills clothing for people who

People and Pop Culture in the News

There are a lot of pictures in magazines and newspapers of John F. Kennedy Jr. skirting around New York City on his trusty 10-speed, going off to do what rich people do. Of course, strapped to his face is that beloved gas mask.

Question: why? The mask doesn't assure anonymity— — in fact it calls attention and at the same time simply says, "Look, I am eccentric, rich and I couldn't afford an oxygen tank." No wonder former flame Daryl Hannah called it quits; it must have been murder trying to catch a quick kiss.

O.J. Simpson has more to worry about than an unfair trial. His money is going, going — gone with those monstrous legal fees. So what's a famous guy in jail to do? Write a book, of course. Not a tell-all book, but rather a nice, "let's boost O.J's morale" type deal. For $500,000 he will answer 50 non-trial-related questions and maybe even allowing an interview with an associate. That will be an interesting book. What could you ask? "Ah, O.J. . . hypothetical question here: if you bought a knife. . ."

Frank Sinatra has decided to join the world of fashion. Old Blue Eyes is negotiating a deal with the New York City–based Silk Club to have his mug plastered on a few hundred scarves. Can we say, "tacky?"

Seen Stephen Dorff lately? You might not recognize him, he's gone platinum (blonde that is).

Tired of the same-old, same-old at the movies? Well, Aaron Spelling is rumored to join forces with New Line Studios to create (ta–da!) National Lampoon's: Love Boat. It's supposed to be an Agatha Christie–type mystery, but some think it should be a war film — bombs away!

River Phoenix will be sadly missed for reasons other than his acting abilities. His insurance companies just shelled out nearly $5.7 million to producers of Interview With the Vampire and Dark Blood because of his untimely demise. Both insurance companies are suing Phoenix's estate claiming that because he died of a drug overdose, he lied about being drug-free when applying for insurance. Therefore it wasn't their fault and they shouldn't be billed.

Ever wonder what happened to feminist, animal rights– loving Jesse from "Saved By The Bell?" It seems Elizabeth Berkley will turn from playing good girl to slut. She has been offered a role in Showgirls, to be directed by Paul Verhoeven. The film is about Las Vegas showgirls and has large quantities of nudity and sexual content (as so few movies do these day). Madonna is also reportedly interested in a role.

Material used in this column was culled from wire services and other publications.

Books — Dark Mirrors

Dark Mirrors, by Diane Duane is another novel launching Picard and company into another adventure in space. It is on a mission to the outer reaches of Federation space that the crew of the Enterprise are asked to face their most challenging adversaries — themselves.

While doing research on hyperstrings, the crew encounters a strange anomaly in the strings which causes them to travel into a parallel time.

In this world, the Federation is one of corrupt power, domination and terror. Picard, Troi and Geordi must confront their evil doubles in order to ensure that their world is not invaded by this demented one.

This book is good because it lets you see the cruel side of the Enterprise crew, especially Counselor Troi. There is also a guest aboard the good Enterprise that will shock you and make you wonder if it is possible to find other intelligent life. . .on Earth.

Music — Simple Machines

Last year the Virginia–based record label Simple Machines (founded and run by Jenny Toomey and Kristen Thomson of the group Tsunami) decided to give their fans a holiday treat — a new 7 inch single every month featuring two different bands. Plus, a special "birthday gift" for all those who subscribed by mail to the Working Holiday series.

Unfortunately, unless you were one of the lucky 633 people who had the singles delivered to your door the glorious tunes were relatively hard to come by. Until now. All of the year's singles have been conveniently compiled on one album entitled Working Holiday.

Clocking in at over 75 minutes, the record features such up–and–coming artists as Small Factory, Versus, Eggs and Superchunk.

With a bonus "live" disc (also hitting the 75–minute mark) documenting the "Working Holiday" concert last January, this is one treat indie–lovers should rejoice about.

—Matt Audette

Television — "The X-Files"

It's spooky, mysterious and often bizarre, but that hasn't stopped Fox's "The X–Files" from attracting viewers. In fact, the show is now in its second season due in part to a cult following that clings to the every twist and turn the show takes.

The premise of the show revolves around the adventures of two FBI agents who investigate cases in the X–Files, a mixed bag of unexplained cases. Since its beginning, the show has tackled U.F.O.s, reincarnation, genetic mutations and various government cover–ups of the unexplained.

Throughout most shows is the underlying theme that the government knows much more than they are telling the public and even its own agents, as the FBI agents often tread on the possibility of knowing too much for their own good.

It's possibly the creepiest show on network TV since "The Twilight Zone," and one can just hope that Fox will not pull the plug to make way for something like "Herman's Head."

Wiest shines in Allen's latest

'Bullets' hits all the targets

BULLETS OVER BROADWAY
Directed by Woody Allen
with John Cusak, Dianne Wiest
Chazz Palminteri & Jennifer Tilly

ASSOCIATED PRESS
Dianne Wiest has been winning raves for her dazzling performance in Woody Allen's Bullets Over Broadway.

It's interesting to wonder if, after 22 films, auteur of the moment Quentin Tarantino can deliver as fine, witty or piercing comedy as Woody Allen has with Bullets Over Broadway. That's right, it's his 23rd film, and it's also one of his richest. A backstage farce that swivels into a morality play, Bullets re–establishes Allen's mark as one of America's greatest directors.

Brash, bright and brilliant, Bullets delivers laughs in a delicious rapid–fire style, an ensemble comedy that manages to make every character memorable in their own little (and big) way. The film also manages to highlight the cinematic evolution of Allen's age–old battle between the heart and the mind, this time manifesting itself in an artist's struggle over remaining true to his work, even when it's not his own.

The setting is 1920s, Prohibition–era New York City where John Cusak portrays earnest playwright and proto–Woody David Shayne, a struggling "artist" with an awful lot of pretensions about his work, without an awful lot of talent. He wants to direct his latest work, God of Our Fathers, but is having trouble with funding. Enter goodfella Nick Valenti (Joe Viterelli), who'll put up the dough if David will cast Valenti's floozie mistress, Olive Neal (Jennifer Tilly) in a featured role.

"I'm a prostitute! I'm a whore!" David screams outside his window that night, deciding to sell himself out. But the deal with the devil does have its up side: David gets the opportunity to cast aging grande dame Helen Sinclair (the superb Dianne Wiest). Her manager Sid (Harvey Fierstein) claims that, in later years, Helen has "been better known as an adulteress and a drunk, and I say that with all due respect."

Though she's clearly the "stah," Helen's bound to be upstaged by her co–stars. There's Warner Purcell (Jim Broadbent) a has–been leading man with a weight problem — he won't stop eating. Eden Brent (a hilarious Tracey Ullman) is the sort–of ingenue who brings her yipping dog with her ("Don't worry, I breast feed," she says. Waiting a beat — "just kidding.")

And tagging along as Olive's grunt bodyguard is Cheech (Chazz Palminteri), who initially keeps quiet, fervently studying the track results in the newspaper. Until, of course, he can't stand the dialogue. "You don't write like how people talk," Cheech tells an exasperated David, who's now juggling an affair with Helen. Cheech begins to offer suggestions, surprising himself and David, when the tips begin improving the play — tremendously. And neither David nor Cheech is telling.

Bullets grants a few more tangles of plot and considerably more laughs. Yet it's a quiet scene between David and Cheech that's the most affecting. Allen and co–writer Douglas McGrath offer the odd couple as ethical and artistic opposites and in the end, it's Cheech that comes out on top, all things considered.

David tries to patch things up with his old girlfriend (Mary Louise Parker), who is now sleeping with his best friend (Rob Reiner), a fellow "artist" who pens plays that are "written specifically to go unproduced." While Cheech pays a price, David runs for cover in a pat ending that's a sneaky homage to the very (bad) plays that were flourishing at that time.

And although all the performances are exceedingly first– rate, special mention is deserved for the heaven–sent Dianne Wiest. As wildly pretentious, name–dropping Helen, Wiest is absolutely marvelous. She's a perfect actress for Allen; they bring out the best in each other. If there's any justice, Bullets should deliver her a second supporting actress nod (she won for 1986's Hannah and Her Sisters).

While Bullets restores Allen's tougher sub–text after the inspired silliness of Manhattan Murder Mystery, unlike David, he's not running for cover. Bullets is a surprisingly blithe and extremely funny return to form for Allen, though I'd argue he never left. All of which makes Santo Loquasto's sumptuous production design and Jeffrey Kurland's dazzling costumes more icing on the cake.

At the beginning of Bullets Over Broadway, a minor character gives his two cents: "The point is, no great artist has ever been appreciated in his lifetime." Woody Allen has already had his moment in the sun, according to the very fickle press (and he's already been in the hot seat, as well). With Bullets, however, Allen commands our attention as an artist whose genius — 23 films later — is still a work in progress. A

Kevin Costner, Elijah Wood suffer at the hands of manipulative 'War' screenplay

By Dan Pellegrini
Collegian Staff

THE WAR
Directed by Jon Avnet with Elijah Wood, Kevin Costner
Lexi Randall & Mare Winningham

In The War, director Jon Avnet (Fried Green Tomatoes) tries desperately to impress the audience with an affectionate social commentary in the hope that we will leave the theater empathizing with the Unfortunate and Unsung that our society's politics are so often been blamed for generating.

This is a deeply involving and, to say the least, touching topic. When addressed properly, as it has been in film before, this will no doubt lure viewers like a helpless but willing victim down a tear–jerking path of sorrow and realization.

Unfortunately, though, the path that Avnet draws for us is pretentious and dry, leaving us with a dissatisfied taste in our mouths for a sadly mishandled subject.

The War is a film that deals with modern issues of the utmost importance — pacifism, oppression, submission, violence — that are metaphorically played out through two children's struggle for identity and through a father who must deal with his post–war trauma. Yet it seems as though Avnet is too concerned with Hollywood drama to attack these issues with that necessary in–your–face ferociousness.

Kevin Costner is Steve Simmons, a poor and estranged Atticus Finch–type who feels his life is meaningless since the horrors he experienced in Vietnam have left him unemployed and with acute mental illness. His daughter, Lydia (Lexi Randall) and son Stu (Elijah Wood) are also skeptical about the future because they are stuck in a broken–down mobile home with meager prospects of ever leaving their small Southern town.

But redemption comes knocking. Stu and Lydia and their gang of friends begin building a tree house, a symbol of their integrity and place in society, from mismatched junk they steal from a junkyard belonging to a cruel hillbilly family. Oblivious to the stealing, the children of the junkyard family (their names are the "Lipsickies") and a group of trashy delinquent hicks have it in for young Stu and pick fights with him from the film's beginning.

Stu yearns to fight back for revenge and for what is "right," but his father, a born–again pacifist since the war, tries to teach him the values of peace and understanding. He wants Stu to know that life is too fragile and that "fightin' ain't gonna make no difference."

The purpose of The War is to make a comment on the attitude and social turmoil this country has seen in the past 25 years. It tries to capture the era and all of its civil transfigurations in the same gloopy way that Forrest Gump did — only believe it or not, the result is much worse. The reason we can't buy into its sentimentality is because of its persistent one–sidedness. Avnet wants us to fall in love with the good guys while we unmistakably despise the bad guys.

But isn't that the point? No. The point of watching one of these American social revolution films is to make us think, to make us realize that the answers we search for are far above the dimensions of right or wrong. Instead of gaining new insights on the aforementioned issues, The War insults our intelligence by superficially dealing with these issues and in turn making us spiteful at what could have been a highly emotional film.

Another of Avnet's misfires is his juggling of all the subplots (and sub–themes). Since they are all so alike, fusing them together makes everything all the more unclear and makes the film's major theme impossible to recognize. There's a slew of thematic messages which may seem like they all pertain to each other and to the overall issue of righteousness, but in fact are overly disconnected — almost to the point of being contradictory.

An example of this is the Costner subplot. Throughout the first half of the film he shows himself as a pacifist, regretting what he did and who he killed in the war, searching for the truth, etc. Yet, after preaching these kinds of credos for a while, he suddenly turns his faith into companionship, believing that you should always stick by your partner's side no matter what you're going through. These two ideals may not exactly oppose each other, but they certainly are not relative either. The War is constructed by this kind of foggy, thematic intertwining which do the film a lot more harm then good.

The War seems to be a post–Vietnam film about younger kids stranded by their heroes in the midst of confusion, searching and fighting for something to believe in. But a script with no foundation, poor acting performances across the board, and sub–level emotional intensity leave this film as a failed attempt standing between Born on the Fourth of July and Stand By Me. The War contains deeply felt issues that apply to today's world just as they did back then, and Jon Avnet seems to be selling them out for the purpose of making people cry. C–

Steel Pulse show promises social thought, reggae stylings

By David Gleeson
Collegian Staff

Reggae ravers Steel Pulse are ready to set fire to the Valley this upcoming Monday when they come to town for a performance at Pearl Street in Northampton.

Steel Pulse, one of the greatest bands in the history of reggae, has been touring for almost two decades and has a finger on the pulse of live performance. This time out, they are promoting their rebel roots message with their 10th album, Vex.

With this release, singer/songwriter David Hinds pledges to go "Back to my Roots," after agreeing with critics who claimed that Steel Pulse had tried to cross over and sell out.

Hinds sings on the album, "[We] gained the whole wide world/ and almost lost our souls/ it's time we go back."

Vex is truly a triumphant return for the eight boys from Birmingham, England. Dominated by a dance hall sound with a mix of their old style roots reggae, the album also has a few mixes of rap and some tracks with background female vocals all of which creates a package of beautiful, infectiously danceable music and sound.

Included with their consistently strong sound, Steel Pulse has returned to their message of crying out over social injustice, the term "vex," meaning irate, is how they feel about the systems of oppression and injustice around the globe.

Tracks include "Islands Unite," a calling to the people of the Third World, and "No Justice No Peace," which angrily looks at the Rodney King trial and compares Mike Tyson's incarceration with a Kennedy family member's acquittal.

Also on the album is an "overdue tribute" to Malcolm X in "X-Resurrection" which features Jamaica's best female vocalist Diana King, and "Bootstraps," a considerably funky big beat dance hall track.

Steel Pulse is a band that is recognized for spectacular live shows and touts a long list of credentials.

They have received Grammy nominations for their last two albums, Victims and Rastafari Centennial. Recently they headlined the musical festival Reggae Sunsplash (which is an event like Lollapolooza), and JapanSplash. They also just appeared on the talk show circuit with Arsenio Hall, Jay Leno and Conan O'Brien, and in 1993 they became the first reggae band to perform during inaugural festivities upon the request of the Clinton administration.

So after 19 years as a band, 10 albums, countless honors, changes, grooves and messages, they roll the reggae bandwagon into town "and it's the fashion that's going around."

Steel Pulse will play at Pearl Street in Northampton on Nov. 14. Show is 21+ and starts at 8 p.m.. Tickets are $15 in advance.

pretty well acted and written overall, but somehow I can't picture myself tuning in week after week. Revisiting the turbulent times of adolescence just isn't one of my top viewing priorities, I guess.

I'm not even exactly sure who the target audience for this program would be — after all, anyone who actually enjoyed their teen years wouldn't connect with "Life's" moody, alienated characters, and people who didn't embrace the rituals of teen life probably wouldn't want to relive the experiences a second time — even filtered through the mercifully acne-free television medium.

All the same, for those interested in a serious (though occasionally ponderous) coming-of-age portrait, who are sick of searching for "Wonder Years" reruns, this is the show to watch.

Speaking of TV teens, I was amazed to see that former "Brady Bunch" star Maureen McCormick (who was on "Conan O'Brien" last week) doesn't seem to have changed much since her sunshine days in the early Seventies. Same dimpled face, same California-blonde hair, same "Oh, my nose!" eloquent speaking voice. She'll probably be 50 and little kids will still be running up to her screaming, "There's Marcia!" But Maureen's been trying to get past her typecasting by portraying the tough Rizzo in a New York production of Grease and having recently toured college campuses lecturing on the importance of birth control in the '90s. Talk about a "time to change," eh?

Elsewhere, there were some fairly bizarre offerings in prime-time — including Shannen Doherty's silly attempt to speak with a southern accent in NBC's "A Burning Passion: The Margaret Mitchell Story." Personally, I think that Shannen's time in the spotlight is running out. One can only be bitchy and controversial for so long before we fickle TV viewers lose our attention spans and start changing channels — a lesson Shannen is probably soon to learn.

And I also caught a glimpse of Jay Thomas getting a mammogram (yes, that's right) on CBS' "Love and War." I swear, that show is getting more and more like "Designing Women" all the time with its abundance of politically correct themes. Still, at least we don't have to watch Dixie Carter rant and rave about the evils of society as she totters around in her six-inch heels.

"Women" was absolutely painful to watch, if not for its preachy quality then definitely for its lack of comfortable footwear. That can be Dixie's topic for her big speech at the "Designing Women" reunion show: "How Society's Shoe Manufacturers Cause Women Pain."

Actually, that even starts to make sense, if you think about it. I'll be a trendy television scriptwriter yet — just you wait.

Secret Garden grows childhood dreams

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

When you were a small child and your parents read you a bedtime story, there was one book you always picked. It was the book with the frayed edges and cracked spine that never failed to elicit a sigh from Mom or Dad and the inevitable, "But you've already heard this. How about something else?"

You would shake your head no, stamp your pajama-clad foot and frown until they gave in and began to read.

Now you can have a chance to see one of children's favorite bedtime stories come to life. The Secret Garden comes to the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center stage for a one time only performance on Nov. 13 at 7 p.m.

Winner of three 1991 Tony Awards, The Secret Garden, directed by Susan H. Schulman, is a musical that captures the essence of the classic children's novel by Francis Hodgson Burnett. The plot revolves around an orphaned Mary Lennox (Rebecca Stevens) whose parents died suddenly of cholera in India. Spoiled and headstrong, Mary is sent to the house of her uncle Archibald Craven (Ted Anderson) in England, who is also suffering from the loss of a loved one. Here she meets her cousin Colin (Lars Kvalvaag), a crippled and bitter boy confined to a wheelchair.

Bored, lonely and unhappy, Mary

"Winner of three 1991 Tony Awards, The Secret Garden... is a musical that captures the essence of the classic children's novel."

seeks solace in Archibald's deceased wife's garden, a walled-in hideaway locked off by a mourning Archibald. It is in discovering the garden that Mary begins to put behind her pain by focusing her energies on the rebirth of the garden. With the help of Dicken (Jeremy Webb), the gardener's son, Mary turns the garden back to its former glory. Soon, Colin catches on to the power the garden emulates and learns to walk with the help of his cousin and Dicken.

Archibald also takes a turn for the better when he realizes how awful he was making his life and that of his son by not moving on.

The Secret Garden is one of those stories that leaves you feeling hopeful. Some of the most creative talents in theater have combined their talents to create a musical extravaganza. In 1991, the show opened up on Broadway to rave reviews at the St. James Theater where it still plays to sold- out houses.

Orchestrator William Brohn and choreographer Michael Lichtefeld worked with Pulitzer Prize and Tony Award winner Marsha Norman, Grammy winner Lucy Simon and Tony winners Heidi Landesman, Theoni V. Aldrege and Tharon Musser to create the magic that is The Secret Garden.

The Secret Garden will be presented on Nov. 13 at 7 p.m. on the Fine Arts Center stage. Tickets are $33, $26 and $18/general; half-priced tickets for Five College students; children 16 under $10.

Sleeping over? Just don't fall asleep

Mike's Mental Stew
—by Mike MacLean

It's time for a three-day weekend and that means most of the campus population will be retreating home to recharge the batteries. I know I'll be racing home to spend the weekend on the couch watching some real T.V. until my eyes bleed and chow some real food until I explode.

Unfortunately, some people live too far away from home to venture there for the weekend, so perhaps you are bringing someone home with you or you are the one being brought home, and this gets me thinking about all the kooky stuff that happens when you have people sleep over.

Sleep-overs are those magical moments in life when the realm of real time ceases to exist and all normal rules of behavior seem to get thrown out the door. Perhaps it is having newcomers sleeping in your house that causes some chemical imbalance, but so many weird things happen when you have house guests.

The night usually starts off normally enough — you, a couple of friends, some bad movies and some junk food. But by the time 1 a.m. rolls around, the sugar highs and the lame plots tend to take their toll. And it was a total free-for- all until everyone fell asleep.

Venturing outside was usually a popular idea, especially in the summer, and while roaming the streets at 2 a.m. in a quiet residential area gets stale real fast, when you have the right tools it can be great fun. These treks usually had a "Halloween in July" type theme — rolls of toilet paper and shaving cream are good stand-bys — but in the summer, a little more is possible. Especially with a couple bags of forks.

Yes, forks. Forking someone's lawn is a terrific adrenaline rush. Picture this: a group of five people, all with about 30 plastic forks in each hand, crawling up to someone's front lawn and turning it into a fork garden. Oh yes, we were restless. The funny thing about this one is trying not to get caught. It's hard because something about sticking hundreds of forks into someone's lawn early in the morning instills a tremendous desire to laugh, and early in the morning, a bunch of people giggling is louder than you think.

Once, when I was younger, coming back from a little escapade like this we saw a car approaching. We were a little ignorant and thought the town had a curfew law and that it may be the police, so we dove into the bushes on the side of the road. Well, they weren't bushes, they were thorn bushes. This was not good.

If you decide not to venture outside there is still a virtulike to look like they vacation at the Kennedy compound. Natural fibers and all natural colors are the key to these stores of impeccable taste. It's a wonder why they don't all just meld into one massive store allowing people to wander aimlessly among rows and rows of pre-shrunk cotton. These people wear wool roll-neck sweaters, cashmere whatever, and nubuck dress shoes in colors God never invented.

Russet, avocado, slate gray, vanilla bean, coffee and taupe are popular descriptive adjectives to describe basic boring primary colors. Items are often flecked, woven, or pleated and they look no different from regularly manufactured cloth. The key to this category, however, is brand name.

People often wear these clothes to demonstrate their ability to pick out quality, overpriced T-shirts and socks. Many people who wish they could be whooshed back to Merry Old England also like these clothes. Note: they are the ones wearing tweed jackets resplendent with leather patches who are often mistaken for your Oxford English professor.

Tell them that — they will be "ever so delighted!" This category was formerly called the Alex P. Keaton Young Republicans of the '80s look. They were also probably part of the nerd or geek category in school with an alligator polo shirt, oxfords, and "60 Minutes" lunch box.

Grunge, "Alternative Nation" look:

Picked up by designers everywhere, this look was voted most easiest to exploit in the fashion industry. Doc Martins, once the glass slipper of the blue collar working class, is the shoe to bat in — any style or color (Doc Martin flip flops? Sadly possible).

Clogs are catching on along with patent leather Mary Jane's — you know, those ugly things Mom bought you every Easter that little boys would look at to see your matching ruffled underpants? Chucks of all style, state and color are also greatly appreciated. Plaid, plaid, plaid is a must, along with baby doll dresses a la Courtney Love.

But please note: it isn't the plaid of Chess King (brand names bad!) but the plaid you'd find in Grandpa's closet and the one Dad wore roofing the house. Even better, try the local Salvation Army for choice vintage, just–been–through– hell–and–back clothing.

In other words, prior usage is a plus. Obscure indie-band concert T-shirts are also needed. Baggy overalls, corduroy pants with flower patches or some other form of graffiti upon them adds panache.

The hair is long or shaved short and Puck–ish. It is often adorned by multicolored wraps, dreads and those tacky, nondescript barrettes that Mom put in your hair — you know, the ones that are supposed to resemble barnyard animals but always fall short.

Bead necklaces add flavor and show off the wearer's ability to utilize craft material. These mosh–till–you–drop–pers line Pearl Street, clashing with the bubbly Top 40 Club goers upstairs. Typically they carry around skateboards, lunch boxes and even stuffed animals to define their individuality. Some might offer you a sticker if you're nice.

Producer George Lucas discusses radio's past, Star Wars' future

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The Star Wars films will be returning to movie screens, but you may have to wait until the end of the century to see the new editions.

When George Lucas electrified the movie world with Star Wars in 1977, he outlined an ambitious plan: to film a triple trilogy about intergalactic intrigue and warfare. With The Empire Strikes Back in 1980 and Return of the Jedi in 1983, he completed the first of the trilogies. He also created three of the Top 10 film grossers of all time.

During the next 10 years, Lucas became enmeshed in other grand projects, notably making the Indiana Jones trilogy with Steven Spielberg and perfecting the Lucas technology empire at Skywalker Ranch in Northern California.

Now, he confirms that he will continue the Star Wars saga, taking the story back to the era before Luke Skywalker, Princess Leia and Han Solo. As with most Lucas projects, he reveals little, but he did disclose his modus operandi on the three films: "I'll take a year to write them, a year to prepare them, and a year to shoot them. And I'll shoot them all at once."

Filming three major movies at once would be unprecedented. Spielberg and director Robert Zemeckis continuously shot the second and third versions of Back to the Future.

In 1973, Alexander and Michael Salkind managed to produce simultaneously The Three Musketeers and The Four Musketeers. Charlton Heston and other actors demanded extra pay, claiming they believed they were making one film only.

Lucas hasn't directed a film since his early hits American Graffiti and Star Wars. He hinted that he might return to directing for the new Star Wars.

"I'll decide after I get the films prepared," he said. Besides his blockbuster trilogies, Lucas has ventured into other films as executive producer, often with little success. Among them: Howard the Duck, Labyrinth, Willow, Tucker: The Man and His Dream and The Land Before Time.

His latest is Radioland Murders, which opened to mixed reviews and disappointing business. Lucas, who wrote the original story, explained that it stemmed from his early fascination with radio.

"I grew up with radio," said Lucas, born in Modesto, Calif., 50 years ago. "We didn't get a television set until I was 10 years old. So for the first 10 years, I was in front of the radio listening to radio dramas. It played an important part of my life.

"I listened to 'Inner Sanctum,' 'The Whistler,' 'The Lone Ranger' — those were the ones that interested me. I think they influenced me to put more emphasis on the soundtrack in my movies. I've always been very emotionally involved in music. I think it's just an extension of the theory that what you see is important, but what you hear is just as important."

Lucas, whose bushy black hair is showing signs of gray, said the idea of Radioland Murders came to him when he was writing American Graffiti, in which radio played a big role.

"I was also interested in periods of transition," he said. "In American Graffiti, it was kids becoming adults, the changes in society, and a time when one technology (television) overtakes another technology (radio).

"Now, it's an appropriate time for this kind of movie. Just as in 1939, when television was threatening radio, now you have multimedia going to take over television.

"I'm sure some 10-year-old channel-surfer today is going to make a movie about it 40 years from now. It will be as esoteric to young people then as radio is to young people now."

Radioland Murders, which was slammed by critics, is a slapstick comedy combined with a murder mystery that takes place in a radio station during an all-star broadcast launching a new network.

"This is very much in the mode of His Girl Friday or the Cary Grant screwball comedies," Lucas said. "Also, we've thrown in a lot of The Three Stooges. It's a kind of sophisticated comedy like The Thin Man together with the off-the-wall comedy of the Marx Brothers. Plus some nostalgia about bigtime radio."

Lucas said he studied to become an anthropologist while a student at Modesto Junior College. "In American Graffiti, I wanted to show what the mating ritual of young people in the '50s was like, something that was left behind in the '60s," he said.

"Here, I wanted to make a film about the magic of radio. Radio was bigger than television today; it was more of a national phenomenon. Now, we have sort of balkanized the various entertainment media, so nothing has the same kind of weight, unless there is a national emergency."

al cornucopia of things you can do in the confort of your own (or someone else's) home.

So for some cheap fun this weekend, consider utilizing bathroom products to get a laugh and have evidence to embarrass your friends for years to come. Just get yourself a camera, wait until the first one in your group falls asleep, and go house.

It's amazing what some eye-liner, mascara, your kid sister's glitter and some hair gel can do. And if you're daring, some nail polish, lipstick and face paint can be effective. Of course the standards still apply: warm water and the shaving cream in the hand gag are still known to work.

Just be ready to run.

offense led by quarterback Mark Brunard. Two of his big weapons are closing in on milestones. Running back Shawn Patton, with 927 yards on 154 carries, looks to top 1,000 yards for the season. Wide receiver Trent Boykin has 128 career receptions, needing three more to place third on YSU's all-time reception list.

"I don't think their offense is a lot different that what we've seen," Hodges said. "The most impressive thing about them is the way they play. They run the ball, have great play-action. If you get them in the third down situations they have the spread formations to beat you."

UMass will counter with the number one defensive unit in the Yankee Conference. The Minutemen allow only 281.3 yards per game. Defensive end Brian Corcoran recorded his 28th career sack against Northeastern, climbing to third on the school's all-time list.

On the offensive side, the running game again will be key for the Minutemen, led by Rene Ingoglia. Ingoglia (148.9 yards per game) ranked third in the Division I-AA in rushing, tops the Yankee Conference. He has 1,340 yards on the season, the third best single season mark in UMass history.

Backfield mate Frank Alessio has a 4.5 yard per carry average, racking up 671 yards on 138 attempts. Ron Brockington has seen action at fullback and has made the most of limiting playing time, gaining 160 yards on 39 carries.

"Defensively, they run very few fronts, don't blitz very often. They play technically sound football, and pursue the ball like wild men on defense. We will not be able to catch them off guard," Hodges said.

Hodges looks to quarterback Andrew McNeilly and the passing game to control the football. Comparing the YSU system to UMass', a passing game is needed to complement the dominant running game.

"We need to complete the ball when the guy is open. They play the run very aggressively, we need to catch the ball and pass protect," Hodges said.

"The oddsmakers won't give us much of a shot, and that's fine. I don't think our kids will be intimidated by them," Hodges said. "They will not beat themselves, we must play our best game of the year."

Below par weekend for CFA

This weekend in college football represents what could have been. The schedule of games is appealing, but lacking in national championship importance. Of the top teams, only Penn State is challenged.

• Notre Dame takes on Florida State in Orlando, Fla. Last season's Irish victory in South Bend was the year's most exciting. This season's game figured to be the thrilling rematch. Instead the teams have combined for four losses.

• Arizona visits Southern Cal. This game should have been a battle of unbeatens needing this game to go to the Rose Bowl. Instead, Oregon (who?) seems destined for the Rose. The 'Cats (like that SI jinx) have no offense, the Trojans no defense. USC quarterback Rob Johnson has awakened too late to make a Heisman bid, but this game can be his showcase for NFL scouts.

Anthony Guido
On College Football

• Houston travels to Texas. Forget it, nobody else cares. The Cougars have seven losses, the Longhorns four. The best part about this game is that it's not played in that morgue, the Astrodome. Football still is everything in the state of Texas, but the rest of the nation is sick of these teams.

• Free Shoes University. Speaking of the Seminoles, this week is the anniversary of the Foot Locker shopping spree. Five FSU players were suspended and last season's national championship was tarnished.

• Who's number one? The debate will rage on throughout the season. Nebraska and Penn State. Many people around the nation would like to know the identity of the fool who voted Penn State sixth in the latest Coaches' Poll. Nebraska is now No. 1 in both polls because in the overall points rating, the Nittany Lions were hurt by a sixth place vote.

As for the idiotic coach who voted them sixth, well, please pay attention to college football or decline the opportunity to vote.

• It's about time. George Perles is out at Michigan State. He had been living far too long on the two good years he had in the late '80s. Just think, he had two NFL coaching opportunities several years ago only to stay at MSU. He says he's better off.

"Who's better than me? I have two seats to every Michigan State home game for the rest of my life," Perles said.

That's a long sentence — for someone who hasn't committed a crime. Actually anyone who watches the Spartans play might argue.

• Heisman hype. Too bad there isn't any. Could there be a year when no deserving candidate is found? Rashaan Salaam ran for well over 100 yards against Nebraska, but 80 of those were in the fourth quarter when the game was out of hand. Lawerence Phillips and Nebraska may win the title but he was unimpressive in the victory over Colorado (86 yards).

Ki-Jana Carter hasn't had the complete season, nor the dominant numbers. The season started out as a QB bonanza but all have fallen off the pace. No matter what is said and written, this race is still wide-open.

• Poor Prairie View. The Division I-AA team has tied Columbia's record for futility with 44 straight losses. The best chance for victory was last week against Division II Tarleton State, but that didn't turn out too well (a 70–20 loss). Just awful. How could a team be that bad.

The season record (11–10) is finally starting to look okay. I'll put my hot streak on the line this week with some intriguing contests:

Florida State 28, Notre Dame 14 — Revenge is sweet for Bobby Bowden against Lou Holtz's worst team in years. Memo to Lou: Keep QB Ron Powlus on the sidelines; he's not ready yet but Derrick Brooks and the FSU defense will eat him alive. They may have won the title, but it was tainted by the ND loss.

Syracuse 21, Boston College 10 — BC has been looking good, but Louisville can do that for you. After keeping Miami at bay for most of the game, the Hurricanes exploded on Syracuse last week. This week the defense does the job for the whole 60 minutes.

Penn State 33, Illinois 16 — The Illini would have lost to Minnesota (ouch) last week if not for a phantom TD call at the goal line. If struggling against Minnesota wasn't enough, Penn State had problems against Indiana. The Nittany Lions won't take an opponent lightly twice in a row.

Mike Williams and Inus Norville both sat out of last night's action. Norville was forced to sit out because of a paperwork error with the Student Athlete Clearinghouse. He is expected to return for the Minutemen's next exhibition game. Williams was serving the first game of a three-game suspension imposed by Calipari.

After all the negative off-court publicity that has surrounded the team in recent weeks, the players said they were glad to return the public's focus to the court.

"It felt good to put everything else behind us and go out there and play basketball," Kellogg said. "When you're out there playing basketball, you can put all your worries behind you."

Massachusetts returns to action on Nov. 17 for their final exhibition when they take on the Turkish Junior National Team at the Mullins Center.

Inquisitive as I was, I asked my professor, "What is another name for pirate treasure?" He replied, "Why that would be 'booty', yes, that's what it is." MASS DAILY COLLEGIAN Shake it, shake it, shake it!

last six matches convincingly, outscoring opponents 16–3 in the span. The team is right in the hunt for a Final Four berth, something that appeared lost just a few weeks ago.

"He wouldn't let us stay down. He believed in us," said senior co-captain Heidi Kocher, who has played for Rudy the past four years. "I think it makes everyone stronger people and when it comes down to it, in the really important times, you learn how to fight back."

Rudy's perseverance has also been felt by his former player and current assistant coach April Kater:

"I think it shows that you have to bounce back, that you're only as good as your next pass on the field, and you're only as good as your next day in life," she said. "That's how you have to live it. And I think that's what the team realized — that we're only as good as our next game. That you can never give up. And they didn't.

"I think that reflects on Jim because he had some personal things going on in his life but he didn't let that overcome him in doing what he has to do on the field."

His 100th career win at UMass is right around the corner, and there's no beard in sight, which in itself is a good sign. For Rudy, the honor is well deserved.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Let others know of your special skills and strong credentials. Your talents will make a lasting impression on someone in authority. Focus on projects that will bring widespread recognition.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Do not try to mix work with pleasure today. An alliance that has been strictly business should stay that way. Put yourself in a partner's shoes. Take a crash course in the art of negotiation.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): You may have to work like a dog to stay on schedule this morning. Distractions are likely. Refuse to allow a financial upset to ruin you day. Find a way to unwind tonight.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): A creative idea will not get off the ground unless you go all-out to promote it. Work hard to attract favorable publicity. Your artistic powers are at a peak. Be bold!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): A struggle could come to a successful close today. Sharing the applause with mate or business partner will pay handsome dividends later on. Someone at work may disappoint you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Work hard and you will end up in the right place at the right time. You now know, once and for all, where a current romance is headed. Steer clear of people who gossip.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Taking chances in romance or finance is too risky today. Be realistic, tune in to your ESP. An inspiring experience could transform your life. Sitting behind a desk all the time could lead to stagnation.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Get an agreement in writing. A worrisome detail could upset you needlessly. A companion who is under some stress may not want you to know why. Respect loved one's privacy.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): You would be smart to investigate a business offer further. There may be strings attached. Guard against apprehending insensitive to another's needs.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Your budget could end up in tatters if you go overboard when shopping. Keep your wallet and credit cards out of sight. Try a little tenderness with older relatives. Romance will heat up soon.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): You may find people dependent on you for a change. So long as you and a partner share the same beliefs, an alliance should proceed smoothly. Do not feel intimidated by someone who has influence.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): You can expect to fall under the spell of a dynamic person now. You might pick up the wrong signal concerning a business trend. Do not become so anxious that you make a premature move.

Minutewomen win NCAA first round

■ Early goals spur women's soccer to a 3-0 home win yesterday over the Harvard Crimson

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The "quick strike" factor, once the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team's worst nightmare, finally worked in their favor yesterday.

Two early goals in the first half helped the Minutewomen defeat the Harvard Crimson, 3-0, in the first round of NCAA tournament action at Richard F. Garber Field.

"No more quick goals," junior forward Nicole Roberts said. "We're not giving up any more quick goals."

"When you have a young team and you're playing against a young team, that was a big factor," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said about the two goals.

Harvard	0

"UMass is very talented. They didn't have any real weaknesses," Harvard Coach Jim Wheaton said. "They're very athletic, very quick and they play very well as a team. Their frontrunners are very quick and the rest of them are just good, solid, fast players."

UMass jumped out on top 3:18 into the game when Amy Powell scored her second goal of the year. Heidi Kocher served the ball to the center of the goalkeeper's box and Rebecca Myers passed it to Powell, who put it in the lower left corner of the goal.

"It was awesome to start off with a goal," Powell said. "It just put the game in a good mode. Once you score, you can just relax and play."

The Minutewomen's second goal came soon after at the 14:54 mark when Rachel LeDuc scored on an assist from Nikki Ahrenholz to make it 2-0 and put the game out of reach.

"That was a great feeling," Kocher said about scoring the two quick goals.

UMass added its third goal early in the second half when LeDuc sent a pass up the field to Roberts, who took it up the field and got past the keeper. Once past the keeper, Roberts had a clear path to the goal and scored her team- leading 12th goal of the year.

"She was just so composed on that ball, she was so calm on that," Rudy said.

With her goal and assist, LeDuc increased her point total to 16, third behind Myers (29) and Roberts (28).

The Crimson kept the pressure on the UMass defense all game, but defenders Kocher, Ahrenholz, Erin Lynch and Erica Iverson all came up big making several important defensive stops to preserve the shutout for goalkeepers Danielle Dion and Nancy Kieser.

Dion had seven saves in playing the first 80 minutes, while Kieser had one in the final 10 minutes of play.

"Harvard never gave up," Rudy said. "They were very impressive. They will be back in the NCAAs next year."

The win meant even more for the Minutewomen because it was dedicated to the UMass field hockey team, who they felt was unfairly excluded from the NCAA tournament.

"We did very definitely dedicate this game in memory of our women's field hockey team that did not get selected to the NCAA tournament," Rudy said.

"That was extra incentive for us to play hard. We really respect the fact that we got this bid and we feel bad for the fact that they didn't get it. We went extra hard on behalf of them today."

The Minutewomen have now won their last six games and their record improves to 16-5 while Harvard ends at 9-4-3.

UMass now travels to Hartford, Conn., Saturday where Rudy will be looking to win his 100th game at UMass (see related story, same page).

When the two teams met earlier in the year at Garber Field, Hartford came away with the 2-1 victory.

"When we play them, that will be a total fresh start for us," Rudy said. "We're looking forward to that rematch. We'll be totally focused."

"We just have to take one game at a time. Anybody can knock anybody off. You lose, you're out," Kocher said.

"I think they'll do well," Wheaton said. "They will match up well against the other teams in the tournament."

Rudy's 100th win around the corner

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

The heavy scruff is now gone from his face, as his team has made the NCAA Tournament. A man of his word, head coach Jim Rudy declared he wouldn't shave until the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team made the NCAA Tournament.

The team has made it, and has already won its first round match — a 3-0 decision over Harvard yesterday. The Minutewomen now look to a showdown with Northeast regional rival Hartford Saturday at 1:30 p.m., when they travel to West Hartford, Conn. to compete in the NCAA round of 16 teams.

If UMass wins, it will put itself in prime position to return to the Final Four for the second consecutive season. But woven within this upcoming contest is yet another story line. In a season of many twists and turns and many highs and lows, Rudy is about to eclipse the 100th win career mark at UMass.

His seven-year career in Amherst stands at 99-29-10.

"You can definitely tell, he's a book of knowledge," junior forward Nicole Roberts said. "It's amazing how much he knows about the game of soccer."

While Rudy will shy away from talk of victory number 100, he can't squirm away and get off the hook. For most people know that this has been a particularly tough season for the head coach and the 100th victory is well deserved, especially this season.

"With the personal things that have gone on this year, coincidentally at the same time as the season, it has made it somewhat stressful at times for me," Rudy said. "At times, it was a difficult year, especially in that three-week segment when I didn't know what was going on at home personally."

That three-week segment in the middle of October happened to occur as the Minutewomen fell into a funk, losing five of eight matches. At that point, it was hard for Rudy to give his undivided attention to his job — one he enjoys very much.

"I was just very tired. My focus was more on what was going on at home," he said, "So that adds its own stress, when you're trying to get focused.

"It was pretty tough. With everything I was doing with my time, it was sometimes hard to get things done the way I usually do."

But now, at least on the field, things are back on track for Rudy and company. UMass has won its

Tony Barbee returns to UMass, sees defeat at hands of former teammates

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

In the game that marked former Minuteman Tony Barbee's return to the William D. Mullins Center, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team defeated Marathon Basketball 94-83 last night.

Barbee received a standing ovation from the 6,546 fans who he did not disappoint. He scored the game's first points with a short jump shot to give the visitors a 2-0 lead.

Massachusetts	94
Marathon	83

At 9:24 Barbee nailed a shot from behind the three-point line, drawing a cheer from the crowd as the public address announced a familiar "Tony Barbee for three."

The former Minuteman led Marathon with 19 points and 12 rebounds. After the game Barbee talked about his return.

"It's good to know that even after you've been gone a couple of years, that the fans still appreciate you and remember what you did," Barbee said. "It's a good feeling to know that you can come home."

Barbee, who played professionally in Spain last year, will remain with Marathon until Nov. 23, when he hopes to return to playing in Europe.

"Hopefully an opportunity will come about," Barbee said. "There are a lot of European scouts at these games, and hopefully they'll see what they like."

UMass led most of the way. Junior Donta Bright scored 11 of his 13 points in the first half and despite being out- rebounded, the Minutemen led 51-36 at the end of the first half.

Marathon Basketball outscored UMass in the second half 48-42, but could not make up the 15-point halftime deficit.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari stressed that despite the victory, his team still is not where he would like them to be.

"We've got a long way to go, and I think it showed today," Calipari said. "I'm happy with some things and not so happy with others. We're really not near where we need to be to play Arkansas.

"When you talk about UMass basketball, you talk about swarming defense, attacking rebounding. You talk about a team with a lot of emotion and hustle, a team that gets each other good shots. I didn't see that today."

The Minutemen were led by the play of their senior co- captains. Lou Roe led the Minutemen with 28 points and 13 rebounds, while Derek Kellogg added 11 assists and 16 points including four three-pointers. Despite the statistics, neither player was happy with the team's performance.

"The intensity, the emotion and the communication is just not there right now," said Kellogg. "I think we need some work."

"We have a long way to go," Roe said.

The two teams had contrasting styles in their half court offenses. UMass play dominated the inside game, bringing it inside to Roe, who was almost unstoppable in the paint. Marathon relied heavily on its outside shooting, but they could only connect on eight of their 27 three-point attempts. Marathon Basketball Coach Glenn Sergent was impressed with the play of the Minutemen.

"I like them a lot," Sergent said. "They're disciplined. They run their stuff. They looked like they're in midseason form."

Sophomore center Marcus Camby left the game midway through the second half, with a cut on his head after a collision with Barbee. He is expected to return for UMass' next exhibition game.

Sophomore forward Tyrone Weeks and freshman guard Andre Burks both made their debuts last night and received an enthusiastic welcome from the home crowd. Burks had six points in his 12 minutes of play while Weeks, who played sparingly while nursing an injured heel, scored three points in six minutes of play.

Football hopes for big upset

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

A dynasty in the world of Division I-AA football will come to Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday.

Defending national champion Youngstown State University comes to Amherst as the No. 1 in the nation. The Penguins have been to the national title game in each of the last three seasons, winning the title in 1991 as well as last season.

Youngstown (8-0-1) will take on the University of Massachusetts (5-4), having won 13 of its last 14 games and tying the other. The Penguins have won 55 games in the 1990s, more than any Division I-A or AA school. YSU has won 26 of 27 road games in the 1990s.

"This is a great challenge," Coach Mike Hodges said. "If you don't like games like this you shouldn't be in this business."

The Minutemen are coming off last Saturday's 27-24 victory over Northeastern, having won three of four games at home this season. Saturday's game will be the third in a string of four home games which will round out the season's schedule.

"Usually you have to get in the NCAA tournament to play number one. Playing them should make it all the more exciting for our team and the fans," Hodges said.

UMass has faced the No. 1 team in the nation on just one other occasion: the NCAA playoffs in 1978, where the Minutemen upset Nevada-Reno 44-21 and advanced to the first Division I-AA title game.

"Our goal right now is to send these seniors out at 7-4. We have to get this one, it would be a big one for us," Hodges said.

Youngstown features a balanced

Hockey looking to end losing streak

Minutemen face two weekend matches with USAF in Colorado

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

In a city better known for late night mail order commercials, the University of Massachusetts hockey team seeks to end a season opening five-game losing skid.

The Minutemen are in Colorado Springs, Colo., for a pair of contests with the U.S. Air Force Academy on Friday at 9 p.m. (EST) and the same time Saturday.

UMass hoped it would earn that precious first victory last weekend, when it played its first two home games following a trio of tough Hockey East road tests.

But Colgate and Union had other ideas. The Red Raiders demonstrated they are a team worthy of post-season consideration, and while UMass held a 2-1 third period lead on the Skating Dutchmen, they have done a lot more skating than the Minutemen, whose inexperience showed.

The Falcons have hardly dazzled in their opening four games, all of which were played on their home ice, the Cadet Field House Ice Arena. USAF was no match for mighty New Hampshire, which trounced Chuck Delich's squad 5-2, 8-2 on successive night. In the season opener, Delich believed USAF was in it to win it.

"We've had some let downs mentally and physically in each game — that has been the difference [between winning and losing]," Delich said. "The first night we made a couple of mental errors and it went from being a one-goal game in the third period to us giving up a power play goal."

It is not surprising that the Falcons' roster contains some locals, considering Massachusetts is one of the richest talent pools for college hockey recruiting. Their top scorer is tri- captain Andy Veneri, who attended St. John's Prep in Boston before heading to Colorado Springs, where he led the Falcons in scoring last season (21 goals, 20 assists, 41 points).

"[Veneri's] the kind of player who's there night in and night out," Delich said. "He's a good though quiet leader, he gets his scoring chances and he's got to score goals."

Veneri has lit the lamp three times this year.

Also providing firepower for Delich is Billerica's Mark DeGeronimo, third in points last season (17-20-37) and tops on the team so far in 1994-95 (3-2-5).

USAF split its last two games with defending NCAA Division III Champion Wisconsin-River Falls, taking the first 5-3 before a crushing 5-4 overtime setback. UW-RF tied the second game with just 49 seconds left in regulation, then Mike Schauer iced the victory just 62 seconds into extra time.

"We've really played very well in each game, except for four or five minutes," Delich said.

While UMass got its first two power play goals at long last versus Union, the Falcons have a potent 5-on-4 attack, which has converted eight of 29 attempts, a 29.6 percent clip. Veneri tallied each of his three scores on the power play.

Hockey East Notes: For a team that prided itself in the pre-season on defense, Boston University has not lived up to its billing. In last weekend's two-game series with UMass- Lowell, the Terriers yielded 14 goals. Jack Parker's offense, however, is in high gear: BU scored 16 goals in those two games.

But the Riverhawks' Greg Bullock won his second All Sport Player of the Week Award, as he scored two goals and three assists in each game with BU. He also lifted a backhander past Terrier goalie Derek Herlofsky in the second game shootout to give UML the extra point in the standings. Bullock leads all HE scorers (6-9-15).

Famous author gives works to local library

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Anyone who ventures onto the second floor of the Jones Library now has the opportunity to get a feel for the Julius Lester experience.

Author and University of Massachusetts professor Julius Lester, renowned for his involvement in civil rights and the Black Power Movement in the 1960s, dedicated his works to the Jones Library last Thursday evening. Approximately 150 people attended.

"I can remember listening to him in the late '60s on WBI radio in Long Island," said Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) who attended the dedication. "In his late 20s he was a high profile radio announcer who talked about political issues. He was very controversial."

Manuscripts and first editions of Lester's books are on display at the Jones Library Special Collections department, along with some of his photographs, awards he has received, music from his collection, reprimanding letters from teachers dating back to his school days and random clippings he pulled from newspapers.

Lester began to transfer his archives and personal papers that were being stored in a damp base-

Republicans promise quick welfare reform

By Jennifer Dixon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Republicans are promising quick action to reform the welfare system with a plan to strip young, unwed mothers of cash benefits and funnel the savings into orphanages and adoptions - but not abortions.

Preparing to seize control of Congress, Republican lawmakers say they are willing to work with the White House to overhaul welfare by imposing strict time limits on benefits, work requirements and restrictions on aid to most immigrants.

But their legislation, included in the "Contract With America" signed by more than 300 Republican House candidates, may be too conservative for President Clinton, governors and moderate lawmakers.

Hearings on the bill could begin in early January and the House is expected to vote on it within the first 100 days of the session. Rep. Newt Gingrich of Georgia, the likely House speaker when the GOP takes over in January, is interpreting Tuesday's Republican landslide as a mandate for the contract, a list of 10 pledges that also includes tax cuts and a balanced budget amendment.

Gingrich, speaking Sunday on ABC's "This Week With David Brinkley," suggested radical changes in welfare where no payments would go to people capable of finding work and those without jobs would depend on private charity.

"People ought to have to do something for any resources they get if they are able-bodied under the age of retirement," he said. Welfare reform was a favorite issue in this year's campaigns. Clinton used his promise to "end welfare as we know it" to define himself as a new, centrist Democrat two years ago.

Approximately 5 million families receive Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and another 27 million individuals are on food stamps. Republicans and many Democrats agree that welfare

Gay Awareness Day aims to stamp out homophobia

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

"I'm sick of people being passive about these issues. People think they're aware, but they're really not," student Joyce Miller said.

Miller is one of seven students in Psychology 390C: The Lesbian Experience who have planned Gay Awareness Day for tomorrow.

According to Miller, Gay Awareness Day is aimed at increasing awareness of gay, lesbian, and bisexual issues on campus. The program takes place on and around the University of Massachusetts Student Union steps and includes a wide variety of activities and demonstrations, including movies, music, guest speakers, and more.

Skye Reed, another project planner for the group, summed up the theme for the day by saying "Be a friend. Be an ally. Be aware. Show your Pride."

Visability on campus

The original idea for the event came from Miller, who worked for the Human Rights Campaign Fund last summer. HRCF is the organization that sponsors National Coming Out Day every October 11. When she went to them for suggestions, they told her that visibility events were always a great idea, especially on college campuses.

"I'm tired of feeling invisible, misunderstood, and living in fear. I have come to the realization that the only way to overcome these obstacles is for me to use the power of my own voice to educate and open eyes as well as minds," said Miller, a psychology major minoring in women's studies.

After speaking with HRCF, Miller brought the idea to the group, and from then on, students began to brainstorm and plan the day. Some worked to reserve space on the Student Union steps, while others created posters and hung them up around campus. All of them are committed to help out with events on Tuesday.

Part of Gay Awareness Day takes place from noon to one on the steps of the Student Union. A number of speakers - gay, bisexual, and heterosexual will address issues relating to gay, lesbian, and bisexual awareness.

In addition to the speakers, a VCR will be playing videos all day, and a CD player will be playing music by gay, lesbian, and bisexual artists. Signs, banners and a pride flag will make the message loud and clear: Get aware!

Students will also be invited to fill out a short questionnaire about gays, lesbians, and bisexuals. Sample questions: Would you take a course like The Lesbian Experience? Have you ever met a lesbian? How accurate is the media when it comes to depicting lesbians, gays, and bisexuals?

Completing the questionnaire brings with it a reward: a pink triangle cookie. The pink triangle was the symbol used by Nazis to mark homosexual prisoners in German concentration camps during World War II. In today's world, the pink triangle symbolizes the past and present oppression of gays, lesbians, and bisexuals.

Education as the key

Reed, a senior pursuing a BDIC in Cultural and Social Diversity in Education, believes that education is key to eradicating homophobia and other forms of prejudice.

"I really just believe in education and kind of spreading the word any way you can. Education for me is a big thing and this is a form of education.

"It's going to be a smashing success!" Reed said.

UM professor awaiting federal nomination

Whitehead in line for assistant secretary position within U.S. Department of Labor

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts journalism professor is still waiting to be nominated as a candidate for a high-level position within the U.S. Department of Labor.

Ralph Whitehead, a 21-year veteran of the journalism department, is among approximately six other candidates under consideration to become an assistant secretary overseeing the Office of the American Workplace.

Whitehead was expecting to be notified of his nomination by October which did not come through in time. He was asked to apply for the assistant secretary position in July.

Because Whitehead's nomination was not complete before Congress went into recess in mid-October, Whitehead said he will have to wait until the new Congress begins in January to be nominated. Whitehead said by law, the president may only make nominations while Congress is in session.

The Office of the American Workplace is a newly created division of the Department of Labor, created by U.S. Labor Secretary Robert Reich about a year ago. The mission of the office, according to Whitehead, is to encourage corporations and unions to adopt policies which will enable workers to earn more and companies to increase productivity.

Presently, Whitehead is on an unpaid leave of absence from the journalism department and is working as a consultant to the department of labor.

Whitehead said some of the projects he is working on are related to the confirmable position as assistant secretary. Other jobs he is performing are varying purpose and may not be in line with the Office of the American Workplace.

Part of Whitehead's responsibilities is to assist the acting assistant secretary Charles Smith who also holds another position within the department.

Whitehead said he is helping the Office of the American Workplace maintain its "strategic momentum" in the absence of a full-time assistant secretary. Whitehead said he is not running the office, but serves as an advisor to Smith.

"The consulting role I play with the Office of the American Workplace is the same role as before I was asked to become a candidate for the assistant secretary position," said Whitehead who had served as a consultant to the Labor Department before becoming a potential candidate for the position in the Office of the American Workplace.

Labor relations and the changing work force has been a focus of Whitehead's research and studies. He said he spent the past 25 years writing about the changes in the workplace and also spent the past five years looking at how companies have dealt with the recession and recovery.

Since his leave of absence began at the end of September, Whitehead said he has travelled in his consulting work — to Washington, D.C. and elsewhere.

If he is not appointed to the position, Whitehead said he is not sure if would return to teaching. Whitehead said he would be satisfied in whatever job he undertakes.

"As I spend more time in the Labor Department," Whitehead said, "The workplace office does seem fascinating, but there are other interesting things, too."

As a consultant, Whitehead said he has more flexibility than a defined job would and he said he also has fun with what he is doing. In his life choices, Whitehead said he has always chosen fun.

"Given a choice of a certain status or given a choice of having fun I have always gone for the fun," he said.

If appointed, Whitehead could be the first UMass faculty member to appointed to a high-ranking federal position.

ROTC sponsors Veterans Day vigil

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Air Force and Army ROTC ended a 24-hour Veterans Day vigil last Thursday held at the Vietnam Memorial outside Memorial Hall. Lt. Col. Charles A. Brown Jr., a former P.O.W. in Vietnam, spoke at the vigil's end.

The vigil, which rotated two guards each hour from both Army and Air Force ROTC, was to commemorate prisoners of war and veterans who have died or are missing in action.

Brown is the 439th Equipment Maintenance Squadron Officer, which is a part of the 439th Airlift Wing at Westover Air Reserve Base in Chicopee. He directs a maintenance squadron which repairs and modifies C-54 aircraft. He assumed this position last December.

Brown's first military assignment was at Westover Airforce Base where he was a B-52 pilot with the 99th Bombardment Wing until his separation from active duty in 1973.

On Dec. 19, 1972, the B-52 he was piloting was shot down over Hanoi. He parachuted to safety, but was captured by the North Vietnamese and was held prisoner for 101 days until April 1, 1973, when he was returned to Westover. Currently, Brown lives in South Hadley with his wife, Martha, and their children, Charles III and Danny.

"The American servicemen has contributed greatly towards improvement in the world," Brown said.

> "The American servicemen has contributed greatly towards improvement in the world...The world is a better place because of vets"

Brown spoke of the positive influence American veterans have had on world events. Brown said the occupation of Japan after World War II established a democracy in Japan which allowed the Japanese to achieve an economic height that would have been impossible under its previous feudal system.

"The world is a better place because of vets," Brown said.

After Brown's speech, two A-10 warthog attack planes made a fly-by, followed by a rendition of Taps played by Tony Ingano, a senior engineering major and member of the Army ROTC.

"We do this because it gives everyone a chance to stop and think about why they are so committed to serve in the Army or Air Force," said Paul McNamara, a junior mechanical engineering major and a member of the Air Force ROTC.

McNamara said people are generally patriotic and the armed forces and the ROTC program give them an opportunity to serve their country firsthand.

"It's just a chance to pay back vets for what they did," said McNamara.

Hillel looking to form GLB caucus

Reactions to new group are mixed within the organization

By Marni E. Heffner
Collegian Staff

A little known group within the Jewish community is often those members who identify as Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgendered. University of Massachusetts Hillel is searching for those members of the UMass and Five-College community who want to be part of a new group, the Hillel GLB Jewish Caucus.

A new group organized by Hillel's new Outreach coordinator, Paul Entis, the Caucus is a group for meeting the needs of an often ignored group within the Jewish community. Composed of various members of the local and five-college community, the Caucus will meet on a regular basis and has plans to hold a brunch and take an outing to a GLB Chanukah party in Connecticut.

However, none of these events may occur. The Caucus has encountered problems at every turn. One member of the Hillel community has been a supporter of the Caucus, and has experienced harassment as a result.

Discussion among many of the residents of the Hillel community is strongly against the idea of the caucus. Sherry Krampf, a Hillel resident, said such a group might violate Jewish law.

"I believe that there shouldn't be a GLB committee as part of the Hillel umbrella, but I do believe that Hillel should co- sponsor activities with the LBGA," Krampf said. "My reasoning for this is that basically that particular lifestyle is against Halacha [Jewish law]. I just believe that Hillel, as a Jewish organization should protect Jewish law.

"Basically, I believe that lifestyle isn't accepted within the Jewish community, but I believe over the years, by the time I have children or grandchildren, that these old laws will be reinterpreted and things will be more accepted. As of now, everyone should be accepted into Hillel, because it is a Jewish organization that represents Jews of all sexual orientations," she said.

A discussion of whether or not the group will continue to exist is on the agenda of the Hillel Council, which will meet this evening at 7 p.m.

Alan Weinfeld, Hillel resident and former Hillel Council President, refused to comment on the matter.

"I totally, wholeheartedly support it," President of Hillel Council Nurit Ben Harav said.

A GLB member of the UMass Jewish community who is involved with Hillel, who asked not to be identified, said, "There's a lot of negative talk about it — people are more scared of it because it's

Police Log

Compiled by Kelly Spang from University reports

Assault

Nov. 10

Police responded to a noise complaint in Moore Residence Hall. When police attempted to arrest William Riley, 22, of 16 Johnson St. in Milton, Riley allegedly resisted the arrest.

The officer making the arrest suffered some bruises from the assault, but no medical attention was required.

Back-up officers responded to the scene.

Riley was charged with disorderly person and assault and battery on a police officer.

Suspicious Activity

Nov. 9

An individual was allegedly firing a BB gun at windows in Prince Residence Hall.

Derrek Milian, 22, of Mahwah, N.J. was arrested for malicious destruction of property of $250 and for a weapons law violation for firing across a public way.

Shoplifting

Nov. 8

Joshua Casper, 18, of 2 St. Paul St. in Dracut was arrested in the Campus Center for shoplifting by concealing merchandise.

Larceny

Nov. 8

An individual reported a license plate stolen from his vehicle in Lot 22.

An individual from James Residence Hall reported the theft of his bike tire and rim.

Bike Theft

Nov. 8

An individual from Thoreau Residence Hall reported his bike stolen, valuing $450.

unknown to them. There's an extreme amount of ignorance in the community. People say it's against Jewish law, but these people don't keep Jewish law themselves. It's just an excuse to be homophobic. People don't realize that there's a GLB population active in Hillel and people aren't aware that some of their best friends are members of the GLBT community."

"No one has spoken to me about anything negative about it," Hillel's Rabbi Sual Perlmutter said. "I'm very excited that the group is starting. I know many Jewish students who are out, and some that are questioning, and I hope that this group makes it more comfortable and accepted."

When asked about whether or not the caucus can be denied a right to congregate under Hillel, Perlmutter said, "I don't see that happening. One of the things I think it's important for Hillel to be is a pluralistic, warm and welcoming community. There are students in Hillel who are religiously observant, and there are students who are totally unreligious, yet all of them have a place to come to together. I think it's important to welcome all Jewish students into Hillel and the community without having to hide who they are.

"One of the programs being considered for next semester is a Rabbi Leila Berner, a lesbian rabbi, and the suggestion for her visit came from Hillel's religious committee. There are other students in support of it [the GLB Jewish caucus] as w Perlmutter said.

ment to the special collections department last year, according to curator Daniel Lombardo.

"My writing life has been here in the valley," Lester said. "Because Daniel Lombardo knew about my work and we had talked about it, I felt my life was safe here."

Before teaching as a full professor in the Judaic and Near Eastern Studies department and an adjunct professor of English and history at UMass, Lester published 25 years of material on "freedom as a constant struggle" for African- Americans, Lombardo said.

Lester's books cover an array of different topics, including slavery, politics, religion, history and different transcriptions of children's stories and folklore. He has also done work in photojournalism and music, Lombardo said.

"He has had an extremely interesting set of diverse experiences in his life," said Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst). "It's of interest to people to learn about his life, what motivates him and how he thinks about things."

Lester was born in 1939 in St. Louis, Mo. He attended Fisk University in Nashville, Tenn.

He moved to New York City in 1961 and played a major role in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

In the middle of the Black Power Movement in the '60s, Lester published his controversial book, Look Out Whitey! Black Power's Gon' Get Your Mama.

Lester has had his work published in eight different languages and is a Newbery Honor winner and a National Book Award Finalist.

Lesters most recent publication is called And All Our Wounds Forgiven. Other books he has written include To Be A Slave, The Seventh Son: the Thought and Writing of W.E.B. Dubois, This Strange New Feeling, Do Lord Remember Me, The Tales of Uncle Remus, Becoming a Jew, John Henry (a children's book), Search for the New Land and Folk Blues.

"It's impressive for a Black man to be able to make his experience so alive in people and move them," said Joseph Esnard, a UMass graduate student. "Different races appreciate him, and color is just erased."

Judicial system to be examined

Prisoner Awareness Week to focus on prison overcrowding

By Hernan Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

The United States today holds one of the biggest imprisonment rates in the world, with over 1.5 million people now incarcerated.

In order to expose this reality and to expand our knowledge of how this has come about, this week has been designated Prisoner Awareness Week.

Through debates, lectures, films, and documentaries, Prisoner Awareness Week plans to bring to the surface something that is not thought of much today by the American public. If the current imprisonment rates were to annually continue at the same level as they are today, by the year 2053, the United States would have as many prisoners as non-prisoners.

American prisons are overflowing with inmates, and the situation is not getting any better. As of today, 35 percent of state and federal prisons are past full capacity.

In order to promote further acknowledgement of the current status of prisoners in America, Prisoner Awareness Week intends to bring in different perspectives to the issue. Massive proportions of inmates today are African American. There are currently more Blacks incarcerated today in the United States than there was at any one time in South Africa under the regime of apartheid. Blacks are four times as likely to get arrested than Whites for drug charges.

These facts and figures are but one way that Prisoner Awareness Week is planning to educate people about the American judicial system. Other approaches are based around the accounts, experiences, and lessons achieved by many people who actually have gone through imprisonment.

Panels will be organized to discuss the extremely high rates of all minority groups in jails now. Speakers will be featured who actually participated in the Attica Prison rebellion of 1971.

Keynote speaker will be Ward Churchill, a long-time Native American intellectual and political activist who is recognized as an authority in political dissent, government agencies, and the criminal justice apparatus.

The week-long event will conclude on Saturday with a conference by many groups on prisoners in America in the past and today.

The Alliance for Student Power is organizing and presenting Prisoner Awareness Week. Co-sponsors include many other groups, including the Graduate Student Senate, the Black Student Union, and the Food for Thought bookstore.

Information for this article was obtained from the American Friends Service Committee.

For more information stop by the information table at the Campus Center concourse any time Monday through Wednesday. The events go from Nov. 14 to Nov. 19. Exact times and locations of events will be announced throughout the week.

Hillel vigil remembers Kristalnacht victims

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

A chill wind blew across the somber crowd in front of the Student Union Building last Thursday, blowing out candles that were lit in memory of the victims of Kristalnacht, the night of broken glass.

The vigil, sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Hillel and the Student Alliance for Israel (SAFI,) was held from noon to 2 p.m. Speakers read names of victims of the Holocaust throughout, while information was handed out to passing students on what happened.

Kristalnacht, which occurred on Nov. 10, 1933, is often considered to be the start of the Holocaust. It was the largest government sponsored mob riot against the Jewish people ever. On the night, riots occurred throughout Germany and Austria. It resulted in 30,000 Jews being arrested and sent to concentration camps, as well as 7,500 Jewish businesses and homes and 267 synagogues being destroyed. The Nazi German government then charged the Jews one billion reichmarchs, as well as confiscating all their insurance claims, saying they were the cause of the riots. Two days later, the Nazi government set the policy of excluding the Jews from the economic system, with a number of laws designed for that effect.

"It was a very sad experience, but I was especially nervous that I would run across a family name," said Sherry Krampf, who read names at the vigil.

"I know that people got the fact sheet but I was wondering if anyone realized this was the name of someone who was murdered?" Krampf said. "There were people who were standing on the steps, but did any of them let it sink in that [these people] were murdered?"

Lynne Wolfson, the Hillel treasurer and co-chair of SAFI, also read names. She said that it "was a really chilling thing, I had never read before." Wolfson also commented on how large the book was and that it still only had 19,000 names out of the six million Jews who were murdered in the Holocaust.

"We handed out over a thousand flyers — fact sheets. A lot of people stood around to see what was going on," Wolfson said. "If at least one person read the fact sheet, then at least that person was educated and [the vigil] was successful and effective."

must be overhauled to promote work, end long-term dependency, and strengthen child support collections.

The House plan goes even further by ending monthly welfare checks and housing assistance to unwed mothers 17 and younger. States would also be allowed to ban cash benefits to women ages 18, 19 and 20.

Rep. Jim Talent, R-Mo., said Tuesday's election outcome signals a demand for dramatic change in a welfare system that discourages marriage and work, and encourages illegitimacy. "This was a decisive repudiation of the policiesof the Great Society," said Talent, who wrote the ban on welfare to young mothers. "We've got to change the incentives in the system ... and attack the problem with the out-of-wedlock birth rate. And the only way ... is to end the cash and cash-related benefits and take care of families in a different way."

Company holds student modeling workshop

Weekend seminar offers interested students to get a glimpse at modeling industry

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

This weekend Image Resource, Ltd. of Boston held a modeling workshop for University of Massachusetts students.

The invitation-only workshop cost $275 per person for an introductory look at the modeling industry. In the workshop participants learned about portfolios, poise, and the steps to becoming a model. Each participant had his or her hair and make-up professionally done for a photo shoot, TV commercial, and fashion show.

Suzanne Metropian, a consultant from Modeling Career Concepts, a joint company with Image Resource, Ltd., said these workshops are for people without portfolios who know nothing about the industry. Over several weeks she held consultations to select the 47 people with "potential."

Metropian said UMass students deserve local promotional jobs because they could use the money. She said students find promotional jobs flexible and financially rewarding.

Promotional division manager from Image Resource, Ltd., Sheila Wilkins said IRL decided to have a workshop here after Boston models were used for the Sports Illustrated Campus Fest.

Metropian said people from Ford Model Management, another affiliated company, will choose potential runway and print models at the workshop.

Metropian said people spend thousands of dollars on portfolios because they want to be models. According to her, Image Resource, Ltd. offers these workshops to give people the opportunity to have their potential evaluated before committing themselves and their money.

Sophomore Linda Tara said she saw a table on the Campus Center concourse and decided to go to the workshop because she always wanted to model.

"You have to take some risks in life," Tara said, referring to the $275 investment.

Junior Rena Alexander said she thinks the price is fair, because other modeling agencies usually ask for a lot more money.

Senior Brenda Richmond said Metropian sought her out and told her over the phone, sight unseen, that she would have a future in modeling.

Richmond has done modeling before, and said for just four portfolio pictures someone could pay at least $550. She had decided originally to attend the workshop because, Richmond said, "I do pay my own education and [the work] would make my financial situation easier."

Richmond said she decided not to attend the workshop.

"Something did not feel right," Richmond said. Although she got the impression they were interested in her, she had to play phone tag to get a hold of anyone, and did not feel entirely informed about the workshop.

Senior Alec Bell has experience in the modeling industry and said he thought the workshop was "trying to lure people without experience, who do not know what to expect." Bell decided not to participate because, "for $300 they do not guarantee anything."

Modeling Career Concepts and Image Resource, Ltd. listed Ford as the employer on the Student Employment Office (SEO) job listing, in Collegian advertisements and on flyers.

Although they are associated with Ford Model Management of Boston, Bell and Richmond each said they think the use of the Ford name was a misrepresentation, because it was not made clear that Ford Model Management of Boston is not the same as the agency from New York.

SEO guidelines say an employer cannot list a job in which a student needs to pay money before he or she can work. The SEO was not made aware of the $275 fee that is needed to participate in the work shop before promotional jobs are given.

In the workshop's opening informational lecture, Wilkins advised the students to "be realistic." She said although all of the attendants could do promotional work, many probably will not become print or runway models because they did not fit the standard height the designers and clients look for in models.

After the workshop one junior said she learned a lot and wants to go into modeling, but the workshop was not worth the money.

Students Tommy Brooks and Anthony Burulcich said they had a lot of fun at the workshop. Brooks said he had done modeling before, and he will use what he learned at the workshop "as a stepping stone."

"[It] wasn't sure what to expect," sophomore Amy Pais said. "It was very informative and honest; not people telling you just what you wanted to hear."

"The more money you put in, the more money you get out," Wilkins said. "You decide how far to take it."

The destiny of a lesser man

Dust covered the floor, white plaster chips and powder keeping a record of passing footprints. The bay window let in the cold sunlight, interrupted by the hulking form of a steamshovel that continued to tear rocks from the ground outside.

The five of us, seated on old paint buckets and unfinished stairs, listened to the sounds of the New 104.1 and continued eating our roast beef grinders. I had a strange desire to sing campfire songs. Me, my roommate, and three professional builders breaking out in a rendition of Lollipop.

"The truth will set you free," the guy sitting cross-legged on the floor said, although in regards to what I was not sure, as I was concentrating on the words to You are Listening To Los Angeles.

Nathan Crick

"That's what Jesus said," said the tall guy on the paint bucket.

"Yeah, the truth just makes you poor," laughed my boss.

The tall guy took a bite of his grinder and chewed thoughtfully. "Well, being rich doesn't free you either, you know," he said, "Just makes you worry about keeping all your money."

All of us made grunts of approval, nodding. Lollipop, lollipop, oh lolly-lollipop.

"And when you think about it, we're all rich in a way," the tall guy continued. "When you look at the world as a whole, we have so much more than most of them. Most of us just don't realize it."

We are all going to Reseda, in some way, to die.

I spent most of my day on a ladder, painting walls and ceilings. If I had the discipline I would be a karate master, but instead I merely make my wrist sore, and pass the time in my head thinking of passing days. Most of the time I am alone, but sometimes I talk with my roommate if he is nearby, and the other day talked about traveling around Europe with my boss, the builder with an English degree.

He lived in Amsterdam for three years, and worked on an oil rig in California. The cross-legged guy was stationed in Western Europe, taking care of missiles that could annihilate entire nations. My roommate spent some years out in San Diego, getting tips from guys like Telly Savalis when he parked their cars. "Keep it close, eh kid?" he said, patting him on the cheek.

The world throws us all together in Pelham, of all places, hammering nails and swinging off ladders.

In this house we build, there will be a happy couple living there. I believe that, because I have met them and they are a couple and they seem very happy. We put in a wooden pillar in the living room, and made jokes that it will be the cause of many crying children who choose to ram their heads into it as they run through the house. We build their happiness, and paint it pretty colors, and we go home.

Oh, it is such a tragic scene. The ragged men and our tortured lives, quiet desperation hidden beneath the smiles of false accomplishment for the upper class heroes. Victims of the system. Victims of the world. It is to weep.

Somehow, this was an illusion of the world I kept with me for a long time. Somehow, that the lives that people led as plumbers, for instance, were somehow products of unfulfilled dreams, unfulfilled potential, or even just the fated destiny of lesser men. It was a life I could not imagine, and something which kept a fear running through me if I did not always strive for more. Engineering. Maybe a physicist. Maybe an environmental manager. Maybe maybe maybe.

The world of offices and pressure, of personnel and management, of the things that frightened me more than anything yet I refused to admit to myself.

I learned something very profound this summer, working alone on a house. I was hanging out of a window, painting the sash, with the sun and the breeze around me, and I realized there were few more pleasant places to be alone with my thoughts that I could imagine. I compose letters to people while washing the mildew off of old shingles. Chipping old paint reminds me of when I talked to my brother about God and the world while priming a garage. The actions of my hands allow for my thoughts to roam, where idleness causes merely the twiddling of thumbs.

We all search the world, sometimes, looking for destiny in the canals of Venice or the coast of Los Angeles. People of the world, milling around, doing their thing in the cold and the heat, in the exotic and the everyday. I sometimes wish I were somewhere else, yet when I get there I wish I had gone a little farther.

I think we try so hard to escape ourselves, that we leave our souls somewhere along Route 66 and deceive the rest of our body that a new soul can be found around the next hill, or in the next adventure, or in the next lover. The sun will always be the sun. It reflects the same off of an Alaskan fishing boat as it does off Telly Savalis' head.

Sometimes, though, the light is blocked by the makeshift roof of plywood, and the heat disappears in the November cold, and the only part of the world left to know is your own mind and the casual thoughts of the guys who scrape, and hammer, and chip, and paint. There you can cut a grinder, and ponder the truth of Christ, and pick paint out of your fingernails, and try to piece together the memories that you have not lost, all in the quiet peace of a dusty house, reflecting the voices of the world on the New 104.1.

Radio man, play me another.

Distorting the meaning of feminism

Recently, I have been approached by people who believe I am a feminist in some form or another and want me to speak about my thoughts on the subject. Apparently judging from my columns some people think I have strong feelings on the topic and a message to send. I am not offended by this new label but I am cautious to accept a title that carries with it several negative connotations.

Tara Ruelle

The word itself, feminist, implies a sort of power dynamic that I am not willing to accept. My reasons for this vary but what most motivates me to decline accepting this role is the fact that most of my intensity and strength as a woman was taught to me by my father. That's correct folks, my father taught me how to be a powerful, successful woman. Those men-folk aren't always trying to keep us down.

In so many textbooks and magazines I have read that a strong sense of feminism is bred only in a predominantly female environment. I on the other hand tend to disagree with that assumption. I was brought up to believe that I could conquer the world, I could do anything I chose to do because of who I was as a person.

Gender differences were not as obvious to me at home because I was encouraged to play with any of the toys that my brother played with and my dad brought me along on the fishing trips without hesitation. I grew thinking that I was strong and smart because my father drilled it into my head. I became concerned with women's issues because my father molded me into this independent, ambitious person.

For the first time I am really dealing with the disparities between the sexes here at school. I have seen how feminism is viewed as a militant, self-centered movement and how your "typical" feminist is defined. I just cannot accept these myths anymore because I myself have become thrust into this movement and I for one do not fit the stereo-typical mold.

What most concerns me is the fact that feminists are viewed as men-hating individuals. I definitely do not hate men nor do I blame men solely for causing the battle between the sexes. I take a much more diplomatic approach to the subject. I have learned through experience how positive an influence men can have over women and how the same goes for the opposite.

Feminism to me is much more of a joint effort to weaken the barriers that separate men from women. I try not to buy into any of the power dynamics behind certain labels and that is why I am uncomfortable with the term feminist. If it were an easily definable role or a socially acceptable ideal I may have attached my name to it. I instead will try to learn and grow from dealing with this experience rather than singing my own praises as a woman. Humanism is a much more pertinent topic to be dealt with, one that I feel a lot more strongly about.

Talking about women's issues, as a woman, is something that I am very comfortable with. I can only report on what I myself observe, therefore it seems fitting that I deal with issues that I am most closely related to. I try not to involve myself with the bashing of the opposite sex just to get my own point across. I just choose not to judge people that feel differently about these issues than I do, as I myself am not a target for change.

I believe in the empowerment of women and I do believe in the equality between the sexes. I do not believe in the perception of the feminist movement that perpetuates the images of women as obnoxious male bashers. I myself will not become a spokesperson for a grossly misunderstood movement.

Condom poster degrades readers

To the editor:

As I sat down on the PVTA bus for my short commute to UMass, I glanced at the various advertisements lining the tops of the windows. One showed a picture of a pink, packaged condom, with the words "Or you can stick your head in the sand." Underneath, the ad went on to say that the disease of AIDS will not go away just because we don't acknowledge it and that, barring abstinence, condoms are the best way to prevent the disease.

How caring, how well-intentioned, how condescending. That ad told me, in its benevolent, educational tone, "I know you can't control your bodily desires to save your life.' That message, while being degrading to us as human beings, dangerously short-changes its audience. After all, the ad is promoting the second best way to avoid dying by AIDS, not the most effective, surest way — by abstaining.

If the media that promotes condoms do not really care about saving lives, what do they care about? Sadly, what they have always cared about — selling products and making money. Let's face it, if those in the major media started promoting abstinence, how could they then turn around and use sex to sell their products? Sex is used to sell just about everything, and the media are not about to five up their trump card when there is money to be made. So what do they tell us? They tell us that we can't control ourselves — not just that we won't, but that we're actually not capable of it!

Unfortunately, many people want to believe that they aren't capable of self-control, because then they have an excuse not to be responsible. Demanding more of ourselves is what makes us human. It takes a lot of effort and does not usually fit in with the twentieth century's instant gratification fetish.

We are not just physical beings. We have emotion and we have reason, and we can choose to control our bodies if it is for our ultimate physical good. We should no longer let anyone tell us otherwise. If we do, we are saying that we are less than human. I have an idea for a new AIDS sign: "Condoms: 5% physical failure rate, 100% humanity failure rate. Abstinence: 0% humanity failure rate, 100% physically effective. We deserve nothing less.

University denies season tickets

To the editor:

Some may say I am no more than a sore loser, but I am nonetheless upset by the fact my application for two UMass basketball season tickets was denied.

I graduated Class of '92. Like most other graduates, most of my hard-earned money goes to rent, food, gas, and student loans. I hardly have enough to put away in savings, never mind donating the hundreds or thousands of dollars to the UMass Athletic fund (UMAF) that it now takes to get season tickets to the hottest sport on the UMass campus.

Since UMass basketball started to make the big time, the demand for seats has grown to astronomical proportions. The athletic department has instituted a new priority point system to assign the limited amount of seats in the brand-new Mullins Center to the thousands and thousands of anxious applicants. There are a few different ways to earn priority points: by being an alumni (5 pts.), by purchasing season tickets for any varsity sport (2 pts. per sports per season ticket,) and by donating to the UMAD (1pt. per $100 donation.) I have 9 points. Due to the high demand for tickets this season, you are required to have 10 points to purchase 2 tickets, 32 points for 4 tickets, and 90 points for 6 tickets.

This is where I get a little upset. Where were all these people when our Minutemen couldn't win a game to save their lives? Where were all these "devoted fans" when the Cage would be half empty during a UMass vs. Temple game. I was there and so were my friends who also couldn't get tickets this year, because new and richer fans have donated the money we cannot and purchased the tickets that we could not.

Coach Calipari always noted that the success or failure of our basketball team was in some part dependent on the fans — on their enthusiasm, devotion, and support. Well, hopefully for Coach Cal's sake and that of the basketball program, these new fans will have enthusiasm and supports as big as their pocketbooks. But one thing is for sure, these new fans will never have the heart of the fans that UMass is turning away this season.

National concern turns to outrage

For a week the world was fooled by a young South Carolina woman who said that her two boys were carjacked by a Black male.

I was one of those fools.

I honestly believed that the young mother, Susan Smith, was telling the truth. I felt for her. I was thinking how horrible it must be for her to have her two young sons, Michael and Alexander, abducted. To wonder if they were okay. To wonder if they were alive or not. It just has to be horrible.

Candice Flemming

A week and a half ago on National TV, the mother made a "desperate" plea for the safe return of her children. She told a story of how her oldest son, Michael, had said "I just love you so much Mama." That was the first time he had said I love you before she had said it to him, and that meant something special to her. A couple of days earlier, she had said in a tearful plea "Whoever has my children, please, please bring them back."

After hearing those two tearful pleas, I felt so bad, so upset for the mother. I was hooked. I truly believed she was telling the truth. I had no reason not to believe she was telling the truth. She looked so sincere. Her tears looked so real to me.

But then I picked up the newspaper and read the unthinkable. I read that Smith had confessed to the killings. She had killed her own kids. She had made it all up. I couldn't believe it. I couldn't believe that a person could kill their own kids.

To me, having a child is the best gift anyone could ever receive. Helping to create something, and then helping to bring it into the world, is just an amazing thing. It is the greatest gift of life.

Why would anyone want to ruin that special gift? Why would anyone want to kill it? What was going through Smith's mind when she decided to kill her two little boys?

Some have said that it was a boyfriend that caused her to kill them. He broke up with her for several reasons, the main one being because he wasn't ready to assume the responsibilities of fatherhood. So she wanted him so badly she was willing to kill her kids for him? She was willing to get rid of them just to keep the boyfriend? That's ridiculous. This women is obviously sick. She deserves the death penalty. She doesn't deserve to live. Anyone who kills their kids doesn't deserve to live.

Another part of the story that angers me is the fact that she said it was a Black man that took her kids. Why a Black man? Why not a White man? Is a Black man supposed to be more likely to do something like this than a White man is? Why is it when anyone wants to put the blame on someone they a lot of times choose a Black person?

It was the same with Charles Stuart five years ago. He blamed the shooting of his wife, Carol, on a Black man. The police arrested William Bennett only to find out that Charles had really shot her himself. Charles figured that people would more likely believe that a Black man committed the crime than a White man. And some people actually did. Smith thought people would be more likely to believe her story if it was a Black man that committed the crime. Thankfully, before the police arrested anyone, Smith confessed.

What about David Smith, the father of the children, in all of this? This had to absolutely rip him apart to find out that his ex-wife had killed his two boys. His only two boys. He supposedly locked himself in a room upon hearing about the confession. I don't blame him. The worst thing for anyone ever to do is to bury a child. But to bury two, I just can't begin to understand the pain he is going through.

This whole story just made me sick. It angers me to think that people can be this way. I just hope justice is done and Susan Smith gets what she deserves: the death penalty.

London Suede's latest flirts with America

DOG STAR MAN
London Suede
Nude/Sony

Forget "difficult third albums." London Suede are currently in a conundrum threatening to obscure this with their sophomore effort.

Inevitably deposed from the magazine covers by Oasis after being 1993's British Bright Young Things, this hype and humongous sales of their eponymous debut (in Britain at least) are likely past and due to the departure of pouting guitar god Bernard Butler. He is often seen as the real talent, a Marr to singer and lyricist Brett Anderson's Morrissey.

Critics will already be looking forward to London Suede's third album sans Butler so they can snidely deride Anderson as a naked emperor without the shroud of Butler's brooding genius.

It would be a great shame if this incredibly ambitious, infuriatingly pretentious, but ultimately brilliant album was ignored, particularly in the United States. Here "the London Suede" are seen as posing effeminate nancy boys fit only to wipe up Eddie Vedder's vomit with their wet blouses.

More would be the pity because for such an "English" band, the omnipresence of America permeates this album. Cliches are classily rejuvenated such as Marilyn Monroe debased yet humanized as slum slag on "Heroine," or Anderson arrogantly portraying himself as the spiritual heir to James Dean on the understated "Daddy's Speeding."

Trax On Trax Off

Anderson's ambiguous flirtation with the US reflects his ambivalence over his homeland. "I don't care for the UK tonight," he sings on "Black and Blue."

And talking of ambiguous flirtation, the man who so ludicrously bated media attention only to be mocked for such comments as "I am a bisexual who's never had a homosexual experience" is at it again on "Introducing The Band."

"I want the style of a woman, the kiss of a man," sings Anderson. So his posturing and grandiose singing grate at times, but his grim depictions of love, lust and life in songs like the epic "Asphalt World" and "The Wild Ones" are excellent.

Antithetical to the prevailing post-punk/post-grunge trend, this album is overblown, overwhelming and over there. A glittering gold blouse and androgynous hairstyle in a world of tie-dye t-shirts and baseball caps. A- (Martyn Bone)

ORANGE
Jon Spencer Blues Explosion
Matador Records

Jon Spencer is God. Okay, maybe not but he would like to lead you to believe that he is the indie-world's one true raunch n' roll savior. Ever since the demise of his early back-alley "avant-trash" outfit Pussy Galore, Spencer has been heading in directions no lily-white alterna-boy had dared venture before— into the realm of good old traditional blues. Well, sort of...

Spencer still has enough sense to keep things "slimy" at best. Scouring the sweaty underbelly of the rock world for the last four years, Spencer and Co. have come up with the craziest concoction of sounds and squeezed them through a blues strainer without a hint of sarcasm. Robert Johnson may be rolling over in his grave, but it is a sure bet Spencer would have it no other way.

Only with Orange, the band's third proper release, the boys are raising the stakes a bit. Still playing his role of Elvis cum genuine blues man to the hilt, Spencer bangs out 14 tracks of unapologetic rhythm-based nonsense that borrows as much from early eighties "new-wave" as it does the four-bar standards he is drawing from. But do not be fooled, while Spencer may wear his influences on his whiskey-soaked sleeve, he is not making music for those rooted in traditionalism.

Ten seconds into the opening track "Bellbottoms" and it's clear that this time around the Explosion have a somewhat different agenda. Complete with canned orchestration and plenty of funky hoots and hollers, the group sets the "anythings possible" tone early for Spencer's "free-wheeling daddy of rock persona."

The finest moments of the album come though when Spencer turns down the tempo and racket and decidedly heads in previously unseen directions. The delicious country- blues strut of "Cowboy," turns out to be the best Rolling Stones parody since the band began parodying themselves, while the slinky instrumental "Very Rare" shows the Explosion at their groovy best.

With Orange The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion has managed to do the near impossible. By combining low-down sloppy New York noise with the dying spirit of classic blues, he has avoided to just playing homage, but rather turned a whole genre around on its ear. A- (Matt Audette)

G. Love & Special Sauce promise to funk up the blues

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

With the concept of fusing such diverse elements as jazz and hip-hop currently the rage throughout the music world, it seems as though it would only be a matter of time before the next logical step would be taken.

On Nov. 15, blues/funk pioneers G. Love and Special Sauce will bring their slinky, groove-orientated jams to the Pearl Street stage in Northampton.

G. Love and his band have brought themselves national attention with their self-titled debut, and an ingenious blend of traditional country-blues and funky soul jams.

In his authentic "blues-man" voice, 22 year-old G. Love comes off sounding like some sort of musical virtuoso, effortlessly tossing off blues licks from his Dobro guitar with the passion of the best of them.

But look no further than the names this Boston-based musical drops in his song "Blues Music" to see what sets him apart.

From Lead Belly and Dylan to Aretha Franklin, Love's influences are drawn from a deep musical well overflowing with diverse styles. Love is able to take a certain element from each category and meld it together to create something refreshing and new.

"When I was a kid I listened to Top 40," Love said. "Then I got into classic rock, and then The Beastie Boys and rap."

While all these different genres definitely reflect the tunes that G. Love and his band are creating, it wasn't until Love discovered Bob Dylan that he began to see the possibilities of a more blues-based funk.

Coming to Boston in the summer of 1993 he began playing solo in small bars, coffee shops, and on the streets.

"I just started playing at Harvard Square and the Middle East," Love said. "I would just start playing a country-blues groove and started making up my own lyrics."

Soon Love hooked up with two other members who would come to constitute Special Sauce. Although G. Love himself was grounded in country-blues, the two new members have tastes all their own.

"My drummer interpreted [the music] as more of a funk thing. My bass player was more into jazz," Love said. "Everyone had a different voice."

The combination of those "different voices" may in fact be the major catalyst for the growing buzz behind the group.

After a mere nine months as a full-fledged band, the boys found themselves with a major-label record deal growing hype surrounding their energetic and spontaneous live shows.

"We never really rehearsed very much," Love said. "We just kept playing live, and everything happened fast. It's really a whirlwind."

While things may be happening for G. Love and Special Sauce, Love is not ready to play the part of a "rock star." He still plays for the fans and for the sake of music itself. His talent reflects his passion.

Known to improvise live and at times actually make up songs on the spot, Love still comes off more as a kid desperately in love with the art of playing music than anything else.

"We're not studio musicians," Love said. "We make mistakes. We go for the feel thing rather than perfection."

In addition to his Pearl Street performance, G. Love will give a special acoustic performance along with labelmate Keb' Mo earlier in the day.

They will be playing in UMass Campus Center room 101, at 4:00 p.m. and WMUA 91.1 will be simulcasting the show.

G. Love and Special Sauce will play at Pearl Street in Northampton on Nov. 15. Doors open at 8:00 p.m. The show is 18+.

Velocity Girl to perform indie–pop tunes in SUB

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow night, the University Productions & Concerts organization will be continuing their fall concert series with an evening of music headlined by Washington D.C.'s noise- pop favorites Velocity Girl.

Over the last few years, Velocity Girl have made quite a name for themselves in the indie-rock world.

Their last album Copacetic is one of Sub Pop's best- selling albums ever (second only to Nirvana's Bleach) and they have recently signed an unprecedented five record contract with the largest of independent labels.

Also appearing on the bill tomorrow night will be The Swirlies, whose name is taken from the childhood torture of putting someone's head in a toilet and flushing.

The band was formed in the late eighties by guitarist Archie Moore and bassist Kelly Riles while they were attending the University of Maryland. Despite spending their formative years in the hardcore dominated D.C. music scene, Velocity Girl draw their influences from a diverse number of sources.

Guitarist Jim Spellman played with Minor Threat's Jeff Nelson in the short-lived Dischord act The Highback Chairs before joining the band, while singer Sarah Shannon admits that her main vocal influence were musicals like Annie and The Sound of Music.

The resulting music is unabashedly melodic pop driven by fast, churning guitars. In their early stages, Velocity Girl's sound was much rougher and under-produced, while the band's most recent album Simpatico is highly polished in order to emphasize the pop sensibility which has always been at the heart of their songwriting.

Live, however, the songs come across with the same raw, unhindered enthusiasm of their earliest singles. The band's playing is loud and energetic and the occasional feedback burst is not always unintentional.

Performing live is still a pleasure for the band, as it keeps them in touch with their roots even among their growing commercial success.

Also appearing on the bill tomorrow night will be The Swirlies, whose name is taken from the childhood torture of putting someone's head in a toilet and flushing.

Formed in 1991, this Boston quartet has been at the center of a whirlwind of popular and critical praise ever since their signing to Taang! Records.

Duel singers Damon Tutunjian and Sciana Carmody share the vocal spotlight in order to create just the right balance between what Tutunjian calls "cute girl vocals and Perry Como boy vocals."

The Swirlies are often compared to My Bloody Valentine because they use layers of distorted guitar noise as a canvas on which to paint dreamy melodies.

Unsatisfied with what he sees as being unfair and over- simplified comparisons, Tutunjian sums up the band's sound himself.

"Our music is sad, cathartic, droopy and it wears a hat. A suede hat. Sometimes it's pernickety."

Velocity Girl, The Swirlies, and Walt Mink will be performing Nov. 15, at the Student Union Ballroom. Show starts at 8:00 p.m. Tickets $7 w/UMID and $9/general available in advance at Strawberries, Tix Unlimited, Tor The Record, and The Northampton Box Office.

Hockey earns first point against USAF

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hockey team (0-6-1) ended a six game losing streak Saturday, earning a 3-3 tie with the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs.

Tom Sheehan's second goal of the year, a power play strike at 17:06 (UMass' third PPG in 1994-95) during a 5-on-3, drew the Minutemen even after they squandered leads of 1-0 and 2-1. The Minutemen fell to the Falcons on Friday, 5-2, as USAF was paced by five different goal scorers.

In the second contest, UMass did not fall behind until 14:09 of the final frame, when Peter Sandness scored for the second night in a row on an assist from Dan McAlister. Tom Perry converted a Mike Evans feed at 17:29 of the opening stanza to give UMass a 1-0 lead. It was Perry's second goal and Evans' first point of the year.

UMass is unaccustomed to playing with a lead, and it only held this one for 1:44. At 19:13, Mike Palmer deposited a power play goal, assisted by Stephen Maturo and Beau Bilek with Evans off for interference.

Special teams are beginning to perform ably for coach Joe Mallen. After toying with endless units on power plays and penalty kills, UMass got a short-handed goal in each game. At 7:29, Blair Wagar used a lot of open ice to beat Falcons' goaltender Pat Kielb, regaining the lead for the Minutemen, 2-1. UMass' Jaynen Rissling (tripping) and Perry (elbowing) and USAF's Andy Veneri (roughing) were all in the box from 5:51.

They could not maintain the advantage, however, as Joe Javorski beat Brian Regan from McAlister and Erik Brown at 11:26. Regan made a career-high 36 saves in his third collegiate appearance, lowering his GAA to 4.00. UMass has been outscored 9-1 in the second period in its first seven games, but this middle stanza was filled more with penalties than scoring. The two sides combined were whistled for 15 infractions, including a 10-minute misconduct assessed to McAlister at 17:37.

Massachusetts	3
Air Force	3

McAlister came back to haunt UMass in the final frame, as he assisted Sandness' third goal of the year at 14:09 to give USAF its first lead, 3-2.

Sheehan had already been a pleasant surprise for Mallen, registering a goal and two assists in four games. Not a top line player, the sophomore winger was even scratched from the lineup for a previous contest.

COLLEGIAN FILE

The University of Massachusetts hockey team got their first point of the season this weekend, with a loss and a tie against Air Force.

Brown got caught for high-sticking at 16:21, and Dan Leone soon followed him for tripping at 16:59. Off the ensuing faceoff, Tom O'Connor and Wagar set up Sheehan's goal at 17:06 that secured UMass' first point of the year.

UMass again was the victim of an untimely penalty, in this case as it skated in its first overtime. Just 10 seconds into the extra period, Rob Bonneau was levied two minutes for interference. As a result, the Falcons outshot the Minutemen 6-1 in the final five minutes, 39-29 for the game.

The Minutemen dodged heavy artillery in Friday night's opening period, forcing Rich Moriarty to stop 17 shots, while his teammates managed only six on Kielb. No one found the net, however, until Sandness tallied at 2:24 of the second period, off assists by Erik Oberg and McAlister.

Judd Smith drew a roughing penalty at 3:11, and at 3:50 the Falcons' power play hooked up, with Mark DeGeronimo and Pat Ryan assisting John Decker's first goal of the year.

At 7:28, Ryan scored off assists by Oberg and Sandness to make it 3-0. The shot count was the same for each team in the middle frame, giving USAF a lopsided 34-12 edge over two periods. UMass ended Kielb's shutout bid at 10:42, as Warren Norris scored shorthanded from Chris Fawcett. But DeGeronimo and Todd Lafortune had already increased the Falcons' lead with power play goals at :55 and 8:35, respectively.

Dean Campanale cut the margin to 5-2 with an unassisted goal at 19:16. USAF outshot UMass 50-15.

Youngstown State game.

As for reaching the students, the game was poorly promoted. No signs on the bulletin boards, no hype of the nationally-recognized opponent, no hoopla in the week leading up to the game. The students seemed to be unaware of the event. The result?

No fans.

• Poor attendance in month of November — The fans do not seem flock to McGuirk Stadium in the month of November

[illegible] Wilson, Director of Marketing, "Massachusetts traditionally has drawn poorly in November. Unfortunately, that has continued with the Northeastern game [Nov. 5], and here today against Youngstown State. It is disappointing that there is no support. Our student attendance was almost non-existent. The parking lots were empty."

Athletic Director Bob Marcum said that the fans of a home team do not attend the game to see the opponent.

"I just don't think that people come to watch someone else play, I think people come when you have a certain run at a conference championship," Marcum said.

"Bringing someone in that's No. 1 in the country, I think that creates some interest for the media, and it gives you a chance to test your program. But at the same time, I don't think the people are going to show up to watch someone else play."

And they didn't show up. Forget that Massachusetts lost to Youngstown State 28-9. Put it out of the mind that [illegible] and [illegible] tance of the game. This was an opportunity to play against the best, the most

UMass beats two A–10 foes; ready for tourney

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team ended its regular season by defeating two Atlantic-10 opponents over the weekend. The Minutewomen rolled past St. Bonaventure 15-6, 15-7, 15-5 in Olean, NY and upended the Lady Dukes 15-6, 16-14, 16-18, 15-5 at Duquesne.

UMass ended its regular season with a sparkling 25-4 record, the fourth highest win total in team history, and the best winning percentage ever for Massachusetts volleyball at .862.

The Minutewomen, currently ranked 15th in the Mideast region, are 10-4 in the A-10, good for a third place seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament to be held next weekend at Duquesne.

"We played really well in both games," Massachusetts Coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We hit well, passed great, and played scrappy. We had a great season, and I expect us to play well in the tournament."

On Friday, the Minutewomen were led by outside hitter Giza Rivera's eight kills, the 20th time this season the sophomore has led UMass in kills. Sophomore Dionne Nash also played well against the Bonnies, hitting for a team best .462 hitting percentage, and seven kills.

"Both (Nash and Rivera) hit the ball great in both matches," Kenny said.

Freshman middle blocker Leigh Readey had six kills and a .417 hitting percentage, helping UMass drop St. Bonaventure to 5-22, and 0-13 in the A-10.

Against Duquesne (17-15, 6-8), freshman outside hitter Lesley Nolan starred, collecting a career high 22 kills to lead the squad. Nolan also amassed 17 digs, tying her for the team lead with sophomore Kim Mizner.

"In the first and fourth games we played excellently," Kenny said. "In the second game we had a couple of receiving errors, and didn't go for every ball, but hopefully we can learn from that."

Rivera again had a monstrous match, tallying 17 kills, 15 digs, four blocks and three service aces. Nash also reached double figures in kills (13) and digs (10).

UMass will head into the Atlantic 10 Tournament Friday November 18th. Barring a major shake up in the A-10 by then, the Minutewomen, as the league's third seed, will play sixth seeded West Virginia, whom they have defeated twice already this season, in the first round.

The other first round match would feature #4 Temple against #5 Duquesne. The top two seeds, George Washington and URI would receive first round byes.

"The mood heading in is great," said Kenny, who's squad has shocked many in only its second year since reinstatement. "We've come through in every match we've played all season."

But are they ready for crunch time?

"We're as ready as we're going to be," Kenny said. "There's a few things we'll have to concentrate on in practice, but if we can fine tune them, then we should be in great shape."

to come back," Rudy said. "This is a good group."

Positives can also be taken from the great individual years that many of the players had.

Sophomore defender Erin Lynch was named the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year for her tremendous play all season. She was arguably the most steady player for the Minutewomen during its midseason slump. She consistently made huge defensive stops to prevent goals and performed on the offensive side as well, getting 12 points on five assists.

Junior Nicole Roberts scored a team-high 12 goals for the second straight year and also had four assists for 28 total points. Of those 12 goals, six were game-winners. When UMass needed the big goal, Roberts came through. Roberts' 12 goals moved her into eighth place on the all-time goals list (27) and all-time points list (72).

Sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers once again had a stellar year. She tallied 11 goals and seven assists for a team high 29 points. She scored two hat tricks during the year, against Rhode Island and Vermont, and was named the Outstanding Player in the A-10 Tournament.

Sophomore midfielder Julie Magid was also steady all year. She had two goals and five assists for nine points while playing the last few games with a broken nose.

The two seniors, Kocher and Mitchell, also performed well. Kocher scored two goals and dished out a team high nine assists for 13 points while Mitchell had one goal and seven assists for nine points.

Junior Rachel LeDuc finished third on the team in total points with 16 (five goals, six

Freshman goalkeeper Danielle Dion was impressive all year in the net, giving up only 14 goals in her 21 games started. She made a lot of unbelievable saves and showed great poise all year.

Defenders Nikki Ahrenholz and Erica Iverson, along with midfielder Amy Powell, had solid years for the Minutewomen.

Polly Hackathorn, Nancy Kieser, Tina Lightenberg, Elizabeth Rutherford and Sandy Shimogaki all performed well when called upon.

Dion, Kocher, Lynch, Myers and Roberts were all named to the All A-10 First team.

Greg Cannella is approved as UM lacrosse coach

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

On Nov. 9, Athletic Director Bob Marcum announced the hiring of Greg Cannella as head coach of the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

The Collegian reported on Nov. 2 that the search committee recommended the administration appoint Cannella as head coach, and that the decision had to be approved by Chancellor David Scott and the Affirmative Action Committee.

Cannella, who became the interim head coach after Ted Garber left the men's lacrosse post for an athletic director/coaching job at Avon Old Farms Preparatory School on Aug. 12, becomes the third coach in the program's history.

"We're very pleased that Greg will be staying with our lacrosse program as its head coach," Marcum said. "He is recognized as one of the finest young coaches in the nation and the fact that he has strong ties to the University is something that can only help in our pursuit of national prominence."

Cannella, a 1988 Massachusetts graduate with a degree in Physical Education, had been an assistant coach under Garber for the past two seasons.

As for his college days, the Lynbrook, NY-native played under legendary coach Dick Garber and was a starter for the NCAA Tournament teams in 1986 and 1987.

"This is an outstanding opportunity and something I've always dreamed of," Cannella said. "There is no better feeling than coming back to be the head coach for your alma mater.

"This is one of the best jobs in the country, and there is a lot of great support from the administration, the alumni and the entire campus," he said.

Before returning to Massachusetts, Cannella served as an assistant coach at the State University at Stony Brook [SUNY–Stony Brook] from 1988–1992, where he earned his Master's degree in liberal studies.

Cannella's primary responsibilities included recruiting and serving as the team's offensive coordinator. He was also responsible for coordinating the team's weight programs in addition to fund raising, budgeting and personnel decisions.

At Stony Brook, Cannella also served as a physical education instructor and has been involved in numerous lacrosse camps and coaching clinics.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A good friend may bring news that sends your spirits soaring. Keep your feet on the ground where spending is concerned. Attend a club meeting this evening.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Get up and out early this morning. Favorable influences make this a splendid day! A message in the mail could lead to unexpected profits. Consult experts before making new investments. Stick to a budget.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Curb a tendency to suddenly change plans without warning your allies. Consideration is the glue that holds partnerships together. Reviewing a recent financial strategy could convince you that improvements are necessary. Save money for investment purposes.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You can smooth a potentially bumpy ride by paying close attention to details and timing. Put your best foot forward. Select the right setting to make your pitch, then choose your words with care.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Someone who pursues you now may have dubious motives. Turning to old friends will make you feel secure. A quick profit is possible if you accept an invitation to invest in a sure thing.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Office politics may take up your time today. Avoid making impulsive or cutting remarks. When evening comes, fulfill a request. The support of your family and friends helps you keep your poise.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Nail down a basic agreement. Involving family members and personal property. A highly satisfactory entanglement can be made with a close friend or neighbor. Be discreet about romance. Do not lose sight of your goals.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You receive welcome news from a friend at a distance. It may be necessary to rearrange your social calendar. Take your mind off business matters tonight by reading or watching television. Let a lover pur

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A special situation requires quiet contemplation, not direct action. Review your options. It is important to stick to your principles where a love relationship is concerned. Put yourself in another's shoes before offering any criticism.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Be careful what you sign today, even if it is only a letter. Staying home with your loved ones tonight holds special appeal. Stop chastising yourself for past mistakes and look to the future.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Consult a lawyer if you have any questions or doubts regarding a real estate transaction. A new acquaintance is impressed with the way you handle yourself and others. Your social life is looking up!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Financial transactions of all types are favored today. Watch the stock market carefully. If you are an investor. Make reservations crucial to your having a wonderful weekend. Romance sizzles in an exotic locale.
